Sound Off

Editor, The Battalion:
Human behavior has hit a new low at Texas A&M University, and not by the students, but by the staff. One must assume that it is a member of the staff to whom I refer, as what happened to me occurred on the day after the student body had been dismissed for the Easter holidays.

A little after 5 p.m. on Thursday, I was on my way to the Geology Building. I had stopped for the traffic officer at the College View-Architectural Building intersection. After the officer motioned me on, I approached the Civil Engineering Building where two men. One standing on the curb and the other standing just off the curb. As I approached the intersection, applying my brakes to stop, one of these men yelled at me, "Hey, you old devil!" I was so shocked at this outburst, I looked back, and there was one of the men, the one who had been standing off the curb, standing in the middle of the street, looking at my car, muttering something. I could not have been going fast as I had just made one stop and was in the process of making another, I parked in front of the Geology Building and looked back. This "high-type" individual, dressed in an overcoat, put his pipe in his mouth, walked over to the parking lot of the Agricultural Engineering Building, climbed into his red pickup truck and drove off.

I do not wonder at the class time taken up by some members of the faculty, telling their students what a poor school A&M is, and what cultural voids engineers possess.

I quote from an essay by Douglas Bush on "The Humanities." "Engineers are not, to be sure, in common repute the most cultivated branch of mankind..." It seems that there are members of the A&M staff who are trying their best to prove the author true.

How fortunate that I was not a visitor on the campus, looking over the facilities for my son.

Eleanor W. Holland

Editor, The Battalion:
After some investigation on the subject of political organizations on campus, I have found that Texas A&M University is the only major university that forbids such organizations.

It seems ironic, that in these days of so-called academic excellence the administration has demonstrated its backward ideas on political organizations by banning them on campus. The Young Republicans and the Young Democrats are indeed organizations representative of the American way of life where the young, enthusiastic minds may find more fertile grounds for understanding these long fought for traditions and the functioning of our democratic system of government.

It is my sincere hope that the administration will soon change its ideas on this subject, and not only allow political organizations on campus, but encourage them.

WRIGHT or WRONG

by John Wright

Although it was all apparently an error of translation, the Monday afternoon report of Khrushchev's death again raised the old subject of succession.

Any logical discourse as to who would succeed Khrushchev runs the immediate risk of being snuffed by the very illogical system of murky interplay between the Communist party and the state, which in effect are one and the same. At best the identity of a successor might be narrowed down to a few men.

On paper the ultimate authority of the Communist party is the All-Union Congress which is composed of delegates from the party organizations of the various republics. Again in theory, the Congress chooses representatives to the Central Committee of the Communist party, but in actuality they are appointed by the party leaders. The Central Committee meets more frequently than the Congress and thus performs a more important function. When it comes to actually making policy decisions however, it is the party Presidium which in effect is the real authority. Members of the party Presidium depend upon the internal power play, and apparently has no set number of members. At the same time there exist Secretaries of the Central Committee who run the various party functions. Thus a person who is a member of the party Presidium and a Secretary of the Central Committee would be in a position of extreme power and influence.

At present there are six such members holding dual membership; Khrushchev himself, Leonid Brezhnev, Nikolai Podgorny, Frol Kozlov, Otto Kuusinen and Mikhail Suslov. Any of the latter five could be in a position to consolidate enough power and support to become Premier of the Soviet Union in event of Khrushchev's death. Just who would depend upon his relative position at the time of Khrushchev's death.
