Got An Extra Snake, Frog?
Ag's Collecting Specimens

By DAVID RIDEOUT
Special Writer
Turning over rocks and logs and wading around in water at night with the aid of a headlight are two of the many methods used by wildlife management students in their search for specimens for their semester research projects. These specimens are snakes, lizards, frogs, turtles, and salamanders they manage to find. At the present time 31 wildlife management students taking Herpetology 315 are putting the finishing touches to their individual research projects. Individually, or in groups, the students selected a subject of interest to them at the beginning of the semester. Since then they have been gathering specimens and published and personal data for these reports. Don Viktorin and Wayne Hanselka are studying the morphology of the skulls of snakes. Viktorin is making a comparison of the different kinds of water snakes in Brazos County. The ability of snakes to swallow prey larger than their heads is just one of the aspects Viktorin is interested in. Comparing the skulls of copperheads, rattlesnakes, and cottonmouths to determine what differences, if any, there are in the skulls is Hanselka's subject of inquiry. Collecting these dangerous pit vipers is a sport for Hanselka although he came close to being bitten by a 4 1/2 foot rattler this semester. Terry McBee and Larry Ivy are injecting various species of chloroformed frogs with India Ink to study the capillary system of the lungs in comparison with the body weights of these amphibians. Another type of study of the capillary system is being done by Bill Armstrong and Barton Harris on the Collared Lizard. The lizards are injected with liquid acetate which hardens in contact with water and formalin, and then the flesh of the lizard is dissolved in potassium hydroxide, producing a complete model of the reptile's circulatory system.
