

Reynolds' Rap

by Mike Reynolds

One doesn't know whether to be offended at the cookie-pushers from Texas Tech, or to feel honored that they should copy one of A&M's greatest traditions, top to bottom.

The Nov. 21 copy of the Daily Toreador quotes Ken Snider, president of the Saddle Tramps, Tech spirit organization, as he proposes "... an effort to get all the Raider fans to demonstrate their spirit throughout the entire game." They call it the Twelfth Raider.

Food for basketball season thought.

While we're on the subject of spirit, a teaspit I know told me the following after the Turkey Day game.

"Spirit? Who needs it? We don't have spirit and we went 9-1 this year. I just can't see how you can stand up there in the stands game after game and make fools out of yourselves, acting as if you thought you ever had a chance in the first place. The Aggies can't beat Texas at anything."

The following quote appeared in the Hilltop News, student newspaper at Cooke County Junior College, Gainesville, Tex.

A&M University will start construction on a $1 million space research center this spring. It is comforting to know that by the time the Russians have six or eight men orbiting the earth, we may have Reveille up there mixing it up with them.

A headline in the Daily Toreador for two weeks ago reads, "Strippers Show Up Regularly In Men's Dorm Parking Lots."

Seems that the stripper is taking wheels off of cars instead of clothes off of bodies. Although a patrolman surprised one of the vandals with a wheel half-way off a car, he escaped and six patrolmen and a dog could not locate him in a car-to-car search of the parking lot.

They really have it rough out there in Lubbock. The administration will not let students ride their sidewalk surfboards in the halls of the dorms.

It is rumored that Hall Hockey is on its way out here at A&M to make way for the surfers.

Sound Off

Editor, The Battalion:

The 12th man has several responsibilities among which are to exhibit part of what is the Spirit of Aggieland and another to support the Aggie team be it basketball, baseball, football or what have you.

Being some 4,000 miles away from the campus it is not easy to keep informed of what is happening. However, I know we were outscored in our first seven games this season in football and were able to chalk one up in the other column by trouncing SMU 23-0. From past experiences I know this football season is more than disappointing to most Aggies.

The point is that the Nov. 15, 1964 edition of The Stars and Stripes, a newspaper for U. S. Armed Forces personnel, contained a small article entitled "A&M Students Told To Get The Yell Out." It stated that Coach Foldberg and Dean Hannigan asked student cooperation in holding down the yelling particularly when the ball is about to be put in play by the opposing team. It further mentioned the stealing of such things as band hats, bridles, and blankets from SMU by A&M students.

These actions do not remind me of the A&M I left three years ago. From 1957-1961 we too were asked to quiet down in some football games, but it was always by a yell leader, an official on the field or the Aggie captain and the Corps responded by knocking it off until the ball was snapped. We never had to be asked by the Dean and no one raised a big fuss about it. We were in several fights during those years too but we never started one — just finished them. In 1957 TCU paid a large sum for uniforms, boots, sabers, etc. stolen or destroyed during a fight they started in Ft. Worth. We were proud that it was not our fault. Whatever the reason, too much yelling is worse than none at all and when you're asked to quiet down it should be done and no one should have to ask you except the Yell Leaders. This business of stealing band hats, etc. should be left to the cookie-pushers.

You people are fortunate to be attending the best school in the country and you should keep this uppermost in your thoughts and take every opportunity off campus to prove it whether it be by wearing a uniform neatly pressed, marching tall and proud in a Corps Trip parade or yelling at a ball game. The football team gives its best in every game, and its your job to help them win it. If they are behind, you won't help put any figures on that scoreboard by acting like an animal but you will do a lot to influence others about what kind of school A&M is and whether or not they will want their young men to go there. From what I have heard and read over here they have not been impressed favorably in the past several weeks.

These opinions are based on what I've been informed of and may not be all true as I am not in a position to either see or hear the games. I hope they are not true. I will have an opportunity to listen to the game with t.u. about 9:30 p.m. on Thanksgiving Day. I hope to hear the men of A&M yelling loud and clear but only when they are supposed to.

Vietnamese Buddhists Disillusioned With Leaders

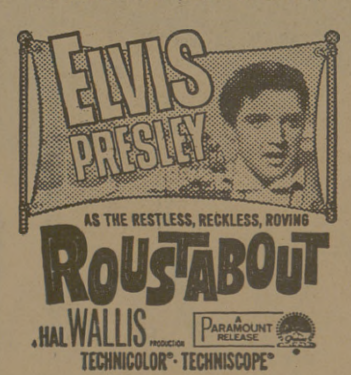

SAIGON, South Viet Nam (AP) — Disillusionment appears to be growing among many devout Buddhists with the leadership of their faith.

"Vietnamese Buddhism is falling into the hands of self interested politicians and the Viet Cong itself," one Buddhist said Monday. "Last year when we Buddhists rose up against Ngo Dinh Diem we were united and willing to give our lives. Now I am ashamed to be associated with what is going on."

The speaker was among hundreds of Buddhist faithful arrested in demonstrations against Diem.

Northwestern's Library Considered Campus 'Lab'

By Intercollegiate Press
Evanston, Ill. — Northwestern University will erect a boldy conceived $10 million "laboratory" library, incorporating educational and architectural concepts establishing it as the intellectual capitol of the University and a new 74-acre campus now under construction in Lake Michigan.

Consisting of three separate but interconnecting research pavilions, each rising four stories above a broad plaza, the new library will embrace a total area of 337,000 square feet of tailor-made space for:

Working collections and storage facilities capable of handling more than two million volumes.

Radial rather than linear arrangements of books and resources, spreading like sunbursts from central information centers.

A library within a library featuring a "core" of key books set aside from the larger research collections.

Solving the problem of ever-expanding collections crowding out readers by providing custom-made space for a constantly changing, but constant-size, "active" research collection of one million volumes.

Providing individual private and semi-private study areas immediately adjacent to the research collections for 3,000 students and 200 faculty at any one time.

Incorporating up-to-date technology that will enable readers to communicate by television and telephone between various sections of the library, and permit adaption of information retrieval methods as they are developed.

Rather than row after row and floor after floor of overwhelming stacks, the new "laboratory" library will be divided into three manageable research pavilions, one for books devoted to the social sciences and human behavior, another to the humanities, and the third to history.

Readers will move from the card catalogue near the main library entrance, through a single control point, to elevators which lead up to the research collections in each pavilion. Intermingled in the pavilions will be private study carrels which will enable students to work near their research material. On each floor, books will radiate from the center in every direction in order to make them more accessible to readers than they are in the traditional linear stacks.

Student-Faculty Work Space: 2,200 undergraduates, 800 graduates, and 200 faculty members will be able to study in the library at one time, at least half of them in individual carrels. The library at one time, at least half of them in individual carrels. The library's flexibility will also allow its undergraduate-graduate seating capacity to be altered any percentage future enrollment increases may make necessary.
