

CAMPUS BRIEFS

Group To Study Water Pollution

A Water Pollution Control Technology course is expected to draw an estimated 25 participants Feb. 1-5 at A&M.

The course is designed to provide technical training for people to supervise and operate waste treatment plants. Instruction will be by full time instructors from the Engineering Extension Service. Leon Holbert, chief instructor, will direct the school.

A new era in the development of fisheries training and research programs of the Department of Wildlife Management will be launched this summer, announced Dr. W. B. Davis, head of the department.

He said three courses previously taught on campus will be offered at the A&M Marine Laboratory in Galveston. Dr. Sammy Ray is laboratory director.

Twelve future agriculture teachers at the Chott Maria Agricultural College in Tunisia are scheduled to register as freshman next week at A&M.

The Tunisians will pursue basic courses in agriculture during their freshman and sophomore years before choosing a specialized field of agriculture.

Chott Maria Agricultural College is a land grant type of school near Sousse, Tunisia.

The National Science Foundation informed President Earl Rudder of a $46,000 grant to support nine new Graduate Traineeships starting in September. The grant includes allowances for the student and sums both for stipends and for the university.

The total of nine new traineeships compares with the present total of five, Graduate Dean Wayne C. Hall said. He noted that the traineeships should not be confused with the NSE Fellowships.

Two journalism students were special guests at the midwinter conference of the Texas Press Association Friday and Saturday in Austin.

The students are Glenn A. Dromgoole of Sour Lake and Clovis E. McCallister of Kermit.

Dromgoole, a junior from Sour Lake, is managing editor of The Battalion, and McCallister, a senior from Kermit, is night news editor.
