

Constitutional Amendment Provisions Explained By Lt. Gov. Preston Smith

WHALE OF A RIDE

Ted Griffin rode his killer whale, Namu, for the first time at Rich Cove, Wash. Griffin tumbled off several times trying to steer the whale before a motion picture camera crew. He held on to the dorsal fin for 30 seconds. The Seattle aquarium owner said he could have stayed on for 15 minutes if he wanted. (AP Wirephoto)

Provisions of one of the State constitutional amendments that will be submitted to Texas voters on Nov. 2 and how it will apply to Texas A&M were recently explained to members of the Bryan Lions Club by Lt. Gov. Preston Smith of Lubbock.

The lieutenant governor said Amendment One — one of the 10 to be voted on — should be of particular interest to this area since it will have an effect on the growth and future development of A&M.

Smith pointed out that the amendment was mainly drawn to allow 17 institutions of higher learning to expand their physical plants so as to accommodate the 120 per cent increase in enrollment expected in the next 10 years. This would be accomplished by allocating ten cents instead of five cents of each $100 valuation from the state ad valorem tax for this purpose.

A&M is one of five institutions not included in the list of schools that would receive money from this course, but Smith explained that A&M and the four other institutions received money from the University permanent fund.

Approval of the amendment, he said, would free from any threat to take away from the permanent fund upon which A&M and the four other institutions rely.

The lieutenant governor also explained provisions of another amendment to be voted on — Amendment 6 which would set up self-liquidating loan funds for students.

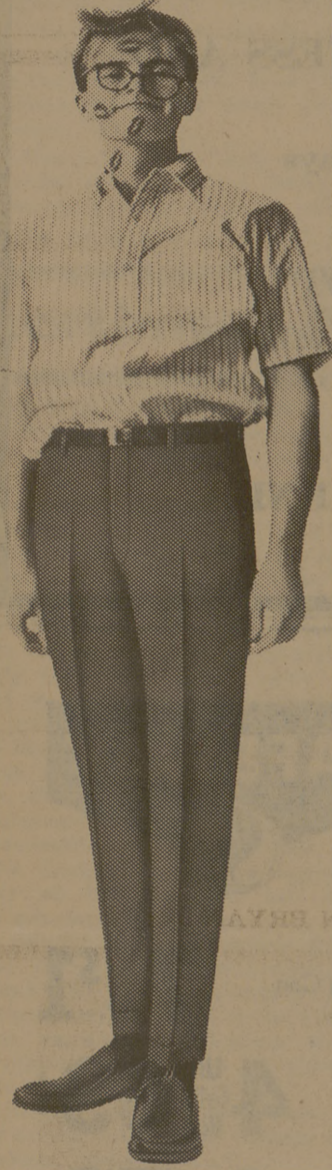

"The supreme challenge is only Texas but in all America day in this Space Age is to provide genuine high-quality educational opportunities."
