Scientists Take Dead Aim Against Troublesome Weevil

Agricultural scientists are taking dead aim at complete eradication of the boll weevil, the cotton farming industry's biggest insect troublemaker.

Some of the major obstacles have already been overcome, and researchers are making progress on remaining problems.

One of these researchers is Dr. E. F. Knipping, director of the U. S. Department of Agriculture

Entomology Research Division at Beltsville, Md., and a speaker at Texas A&M's 15th annual Agricultural Aviation Conference and Short Course on Pest Control this week.

About 350 conference members heard the scientist say the economic importance of the boll weevil justifies complete eradication of the insect.

"Moreover, I believe the chances are good that practical procedures can be developed for complete elimination of boll weevil populations."

One of those practical procedures is integrated use of insecticides and sterile male boll weevil releases, an "approach that looks especially promising," he said. A feature of the system is maximum control with minimum insecticide use.
