Psychology Prof Teaches Speed Reading Courses

Having trouble with your reading?

Does it take a couple of hours to read a single chapter? If so, talk to Dr. C. E. McCandless of the Department of Education and Psychology.

"Most students realize the need to read and remember vast amounts of material in a relatively short period of time," said McCandless, director of the department's reading laboratory.

In order to enable students to cope with these extensive reading requirements, the department is offering two courses, one for graduates and one for undergraduates. They are Education 681 and Education 101.

"You wouldn't read a novel in the same way you would a history or a chemistry book," McCandless commented.

The novel might be for enjoyment alone while the others might need more careful reading to dig out facts and other information, he said.

Average students start the course reading about 250 words per minute. Most students, after four weeks of classes, are now reading about 350 words per minute and many are up to 200 and 300 words over their starting speeds.

This increase is accomplished through laboratory work with various machines. The magnetic reading accelerator helps the students read quickly. It has an arm which passes over the page of print, blocking out lines at a speed set by the student.

The Craig Reader is an electronic device which flashes individual sentences and numbers on a small screen. Its purpose is to train the eye to quickly see and record images.

As the students become proficient at various reading speeds, McCandless increases the speed at which they set their machines. He usually increases the speed in 50 word per minute increments.

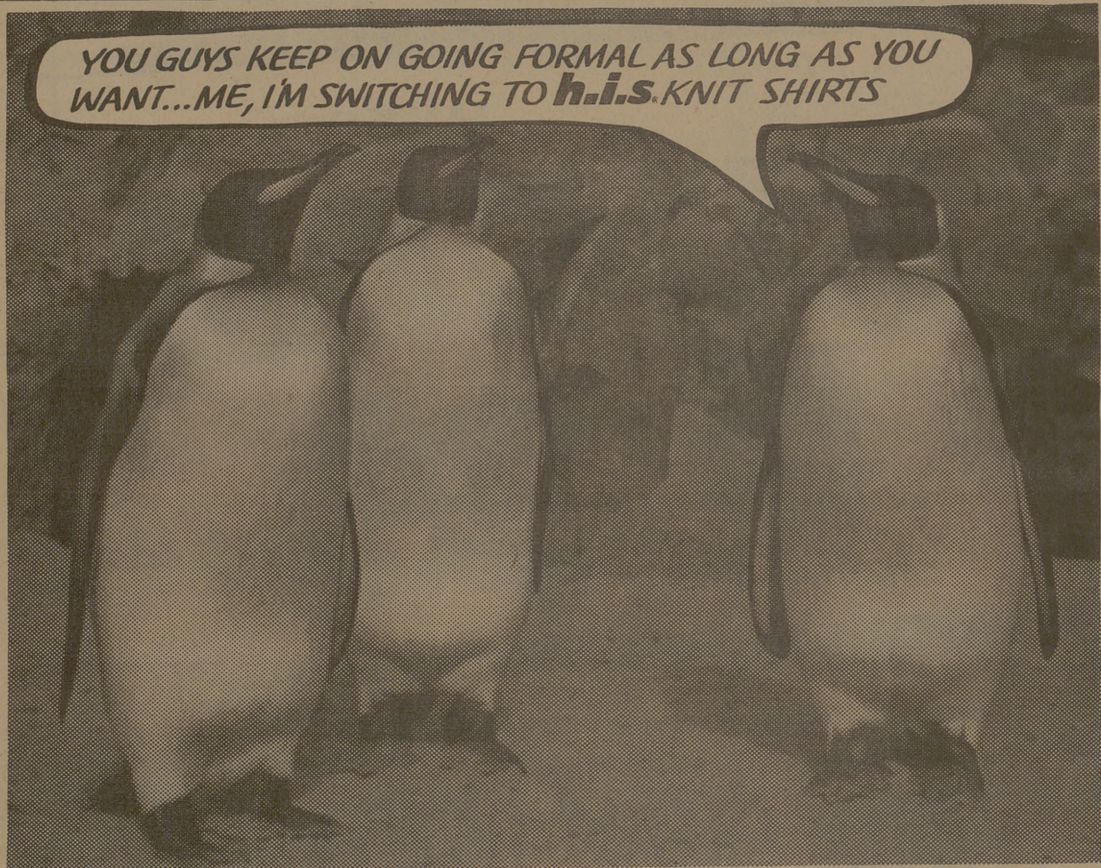

"If you are reading at a comfortable rate you won't improve," McCandless says. As a result of this he keeps his students reading at an uncomfortable rate.

Students test themselves after each exercise to see if they have understood what they have read. If they have not understood the material when read at a certain speed they do not progress to a faster speed. They first attain a level of about 80 per cent comprehension at a reading speed and then they go to the next plateau.

Prof Conducts Meet For Research Group

W. L. Trock, assistant professor in the Department of Agricultural Economics and Sociology, is holding a conference with personnel of the Economic Research Service, and the Office of Business Economics in Washington, D. C., this week.

The conference concerns research techniques being used in regional watershed and river basin planning and development. Special concern will be given to data requirements and analytical technique requirements for this type of research.

Graduate Named To JETS Post

J. Kelly Elliott, a Texas A&M graduate and executive vice president of Macco Oil Tool Company, Houston, is new chairman of the Texas Advisory Committee of the Junior Engineering Technical Society.

Elliott replaces John S. Bell, Houston area manager for Humble Oil and Refining Company. JETS provides guidance for high school students in Texas who aspire to become engineers.

Kelly is a registered professional engineer, member of the Beta Pi, Texas Society of Professional Engineers, American Institute of Mechanical Engineers and the American Petroleum Institute. He is on the Transactions Editorial Committee of SPE, a past president of the Baytown Chapter of SPE, and a state TSPE director and state director of the organization.

The new chairman earned masters and bachelor's degrees in petroleum engineering at A&M.

Three new at-large members were named to 3-year terms of the Texas Advisory Committee for JETS during the state meeting here recently. They include Phil Kosub, an engineer for Pease Brewing Company, San Antonio; Kenneth E. Esmond, an Odessa consulting engineer, and Lee Landauer of Landauer & Associates, consulting engineers, Dallas.

F. H. Dotterwich, chairman of engineering at Texas College of Arts and Industries, Kingsville, and E. L. Misegades, manager for supporting engineering operations, General Electric Company, Tyler, were re-elected to the committee.

Retiring members of the 3-man committee are W. G. Smith, Austral Oil Company, Houston, and Robert F. Wall, Monsanto Chemical Company, Texas City.
