First Female Math Prof Likes Astronomy, Music

A classical piano playing teacher with a yen for astronomy is the first female math professor at Texas A&M.

Dr. Ruth E. Goodman joined the department this summer under new math head Dr. Morris Ostrofsky. She will organize college algebra, teach three courses of 102 and senior-level modern algebra.

Being the first lady math prof at A&M isn't a new experience for Miss Goodman, who said she had a similar honor at an earlier teaching post.

"Several times in the course of my studies, I've been the only woman in a class," she noted.

Eleven years of teaching background at numerous institutions will be enhanced by her industrial experience at Westinghouse she feels.

"I think I'll have an advantage, having been out in industry," she explained. "This frequently happens in freshman math. A question is asked about a practical problem. When the teacher says it was solved industrially, this way a class sits up and listens."

Miss Goodman was with Westinghouse at Baltimore and Pittsburgh as an advisory mathematician and digital computer techniques section manager 12 years before coming to A&M. She taught at Syracuse, Vassar, Queens College and Duquesne University prior to 1953, when she joined Westinghouse.

The full professor had a year's leave from the firm to teach at an engineering school, Rose Polytechnic Institute at Terre Haute, Ind.

She took degrees at Ball State Teachers College, Indiana and Pennsylvania Universities after graduating from Atherton High School for Girls at Louisville, Ky. A Bennett Fellowship she held in graduate school was one of five available.

"When I first started graduate work, I had the idea of being an astronomer," she confided. "I always had interest in science."

The basic tool of all science won out, however, and Dr. Goodman became a mathematician. She first worked for Ostrofsky in 1948 at Duquesne, when she was department chairman. They have been associated since.

Piano, swimming and cooking are her favorite pastimes, she is eager to locate her home and kitchen in an apartment.

"I prefer classical music, but I wish I could play Bach," she remarked. Experiments with Chinese and Italian recipes fits her culinary whims. Her favorite is Chinese egg roll.

Weekly tests supplement the schedule of two or three hour quizzes and the final. Miss Goodman doesn't plan surprises for her math students.

"We'll start one class with 10 to 15 minute quiz," she promised. "It will be on a set day, the students will know what is."
