

Physiologist Van Overbeek To Head New Life Sciences Institute

Dr. Johannes van Overbeek, chief plant physiologist of Shell Development Company, has been named director of the newly created Institute for Life Sciences at Texas A&M.

President Earl Rudder also appointed Col. William P. Fife as assistant director of administration for the institute.

The Institute of Life Sciences is a division of the College of Science. Graduate programs in most important areas of the life sciences will be emphasized, Rudder explained.

He said the Department of Biology will merge with the institute. Other areas of specialization include marine biology, genetics, plant and animal regulations, photobiology, and environmental biology, which includes pollution in marine work.

"We are looking to Dr. Overbeek and Col. Fife to guide a large expansion of our graduate program," Rudder said.

The institute will be housed in the biological sciences building to be completed in August, 1967. Biology and chemistry now total 80 graduate students and Rudder hopes that the enrollment will triple within four years.

At Modesto, Calif., Overbeek has led Shell researchers since 1947 in fundamental studies of plant growth regulators, combining this responsibility with leadership of teams on plant nutrition, herbicides and exploratory biology.

Overbeek for four years headed plant physiology research at the Institute of Tropical Agriculture in Puerto Rico. He studied biology, chemistry and physics at the Universities of Lyden and Utrecht, and earned the Ph.D. cum laude in 1933 from Utrecht. The king of Belgium named him Doctor honoris causa in agronomy in 1960.

Fife earned a doctorate in physiology from Ohio State University in 1962. He has as B.S. degree in zoology from the University of Oregon and a master's degree from George Washington University.

INFORMAL PARTY IN HIS HONOR
Dr. A. V. Moore, right, who retired last week after 29 years of dairy science teaching and research at Texas A&M, receives an engraved silver tray during an informal party in his honor. His wife looks on. Making the presentation is Tony Scarpinato, creamery worker with the most years of service in the milk plant. Moore will be formally recognized at a dinner being planned for later.
