

Writing Style Now Analyzed By Computers

Stylistic analysis by computer can reveal writing differences as distinctive as the writers' fingerprints, Dr. H. O. Hartley informed a Computer Orientation Seminar at Texas A&M recently.

Attended by 50 laymen from English, history, education, business and modern languages departments, the seminar challenged humanists to meet the computer age head-on.

Sessions continued Tuesday and Wednesday nights with Professors Gene Dippel, R. V. Roach and graduate student James Pye speaking. The seminar provided background for the National Conference on Computer Research in the Humanities at A&M Nov. 17-18. Both meetings were sponsored by A&M's Center for Computer Research in the Humanities.

Dr. Hartley, Institute of Statistics director, described a project in which disputed authorship of 12 Federalist Papers was settled by computer.

"A computer and statistical technique-aided stylistic analysis was performed on Federalist Papers known to have been written by Alexander Hamilton and James Madison," Hartley explained.

"High-frequency key words were determined which differentiated the styles of the two men as distinctly as their fingerprints," he declared.

A similar analysis of the 12 disputed papers in the Marstellar-Wallace project revealed conclusive style similarity to Hamilton papers.

Hartley said interdisciplinary team-work between humanists and computer-technicians is valid, but issued a warning.

"Communication must be well-defined, lest the correct answer be given to a question which was never asked," he emphasized.

Seminar co-director Milton Huggert said Dippel, who explained what a computer is, will speak on "How A Computer Thinks" and how to communicate with a computer. Second hour presentations will cover "Decision-Making in a Folklore Study," by Pye and "Communicating With a Computer in Anglo-Saxon" by Roach.
