TTI To Research Asphalt Problems

WASHINGTON, D. C. — Spring thaws often signal impending headaches for the engineers who must maintain asphalt highways. The thaws, along with excess moisture and extreme temperatures, can take a heavy toll by reducing the load-carrying capacity of asphalt roadways.

As a preventive measure, local officials periodically find it necessary to impose load restrictions on such highways. Unfortunately, the decisions to do so are often made on a "rule of thumb" basis.

In response to the need for more objective criteria for applying load limits, the Highway Research Board-administered National Cooperative Highway Research Program (NCHRP) has awarded an 18-month $50,000 contract to the Texas A&M Research Foundation for research by the Texas Transportation Institute to seek a solution to the problem. The project contract calls for the development of a method that is nondestructive, as well as simple and rapid to conduct.

There will be three phases to the project:

PHASE 1 will be concerned with the development of a detailed plan and will include making arrangements with several northern states for use of certain highways in the research.

PHASE 2 will be concerned with the selection of test sections and making measurements of relative pavement stiffness.

PHASE 3 will be concerned with data analysis and the writing of a final report to be published by the Highway Research Board for the NCHRP.

A&M Gets Grant To Do Research For Professors

Four National Science Foundation grants totaling $81,040 have been awarded to Texas A&M to conduct summer research programs for college teachers.

Coleman Loyd, NSF coordinator at A&M, said the programs are for faculty members at institutions not currently doing research. Offerings are in physics, civil engineering, chemistry and plant sciences.

Loyd said teachers selected for the June 5 to Aug. 25 sessions will receive, in addition to tuition, travel and dependents' allowances, $75 weekly if pre-doctoral candidates, and $100 weekly if post-doctoral students.

Dr. O. Dayle Sittler directs research in physics. Dr. Charles Samson heads the civil engineering program. In chemistry, the director is Dr. Edward A. Meyers. Heading plant sciences research is Dr. David Rosberg.
