four weeks of the Alaminos' cruise in the Eastern Tropical Pacific says the longest A&M oceanographic research trip is "going well"

Robert Molinari, 23, was a technician on the first leg of the Alaminos' first research cruise in the Pacific, under four-nation EASTROPAC arrangement.

Professor John D. Cochrane, chief scientist, was pleased with cruise results, Molinari said.

"All of the equipment was working well," the oceanography graduate student noted.

MOLINARI, of New York City, took measurements of salinity, dent who participated in the first temperature profiles as a technician on the first leg of the 80-day cruise. He said he also helped take samples with biological nets.

> The Alaminos is also acquiring data with a fluorimeter, new current metes, cameras for sky pictures, and equipment for making computer punch tape directly from meteorological sensing de-

Another graduate student replaced Molinari, who returned to A&M following the research ship's first docking at Callao, Peru. Two other A&M scientists joined the cruise at Callao.

MOLINARI said high points of
