Chemical Control Needed To Stop Herbicide Water Pollution

Established and well-researched herbicides are potential water pollutants but only when they are improperly used, the second annual Industrial Weed Control Conference's keynote speaker said here Monday.

Dr. F. L. Timmons, leader of U. S. Department of Agriculture weed investigations at Laramie, Wyo., said almost any chemical is dangerous when used wrong. He cited gasoline, aspirin and common table salt as examples.

About 112 persons attending the conference heard the speaker say there is a critical need for newer and better herbicides. There also is a great need to determine tolerances and residual traits of new materials and for some of those already in use.

The problem is so pressing, Timmons said, that a special government committee has been established in Washington, D. C., to study the situation.

The weed control authority pointed out that most herbicides are non-toxic to humans and animals. Fish, however, are often highly sensitive to chemicals. He explained that even mechanical weed control around water

Press Is Molder Of Public Ideas, Educator Says

The United States press is one of the critical factors in educational advancement, a New York State Teachers Association official reasons.

"Since the press is still the main molder of public opinion, schools cannot progress much beyond the knowledge of the editor," declared Clayton Rose, NYSTA public relations director.

He challenged educational participants of a Texas A&M conference to get to know their editors, to keep them informed of new programs and ideas being installed in schools and to help them keep the public informed.

"Don't go to him only when you need something," Rose warned. He noted that the public trust of the best education possible for our children is a "joint stewardship between the press and schools."

"The kinds of schools and programs people support are the kinds of schools and programs that they understand," Rose pointed out.

He said an Associated Press science writer now on the journalism faculty of the University of India best described the responsibility.

"Don't underestimate the public's curiosity about what is going on," G. K. Hadenfield was quoted. "People have a double interest in what's going on in schools."

Rose made the Monday banquet address of a two-day meeting of A&M and Tyler, Marshall, Longview and Lufkin school district officials. The conference is the first meeting of a Title III project designed to examine new, innovative school practices, introduce them in the member schools and assess dissemination techniques.

Timmons noted that some chemicals react strangely when applied to weeds along water courses. Copper sulphate, for example, is hard on fish life, but warm blooded animals and humans are relatively insensitive to it.

On the other hand, sodium arsenite is deadly to warm blooded animals and humans. Yet, most fishes appear to stand it at concentrations necessary to control weeds.

Conference Chairman Dr. Wayne McCully of the A&M Range Science Department said the meeting (Oct. 23-24) covered such topics as beauty and utility in vegetation, herbicide safety, soil sterilization, selective control, new methods of control, and use of control equipment.

Sponsors were the Texas Agricultural Experiment Station and the Texas Transportation Institute.
