"Living Lessons from the New London Explosion" will be the subject of the message Sunday morning at 8:30 a.m. over the Jackson Radio Hour on WTAW. Rev. DOG GETS RADIOISOTOPE

Dr. William C. Banks of Texas A&M University's College of Veterinary Medicine examines "Bandit" a cocker-spaniel who received a treatment of radioactive iodine prepared in the university's nuclear reactor.

Isotope Scanner Used By Vet School

Texas A&M has received a radioisotope scanner which will be used in research in biomedical engineering and in veterinary medicine studies and treatment.

The scanner, given to A&M by the M. D. Anderson Hospital in Houston, maps concentrations of radioactive isotopes in living organisms, according to Dr. William C. Banks of the College of Veterinary Medicine.

"It's been shown recently that radioactive isotopes can be a great deal of help on a clinical basis in diagnosis," Dr. Banks said.

Although it has just been calibrated, the machine already has been used in an attempt to analyze results of treatment of an elderly Cocker Spaniel named "Bandit."

Dr. Banks and co-workers used A&M's swimming-pool nuclear reactor to obtain a quantity of radioactive iodine which was given Bandit in an attempt to cure a thyroid cancer.

Banks is particularly interested in the use of isotopes to improve techniques of diagnosing cancers and arthritic conditions in animals.

"Sometimes conventional methods don't pick up cancer or arthritis early," he said.

The scanner "will give us an opportunity to do some pilot studies," Banks added.

He has been working with Dr. Dan Hightower who is interested in research in biomedical engineering.

Texas A&M has a substantial array of facilities which can be used in this work, it was pointed out. In addition to the nuclear reactor which is soon to be given more powerful fuel elements the university has a large variable energy cyclotron used in producing short-lived isotopes for research.
