Oceanography Head Takes Navy Teaching Position

Dr. Dale F. Leipper, Texas A&M oceanography professor and former department head, has been named to chair the U. S. Navy Post-Graduate School's Oceanography Department.

He will join the faculty of the Monterey, Calif., school in the late summer.

The 53-year-old professor received his bachelor of science in mathematics at Wittenberg in 1937. He took the M.A. at Ohio State in 1939 and after military service as a weather officer and oceanographer received one of the first doctorates in physical oceanography at Scripps Institution, University of California.

Dr. Leipper was A&M's first oceanography department head, from 1949 to 1964. In research programs and instruction since, he has "contributed immeasurably to the building of the department," according to Dr. Richard A. Geyer, the present head. He has taught at Ohio State, Scripps and A&M.

Texas A&M degree programs appeal to 370 international students who have remained on campus for summer course work.

The students of 48 countries are studying aerospace engineering, zoology and everything between. Better than half are graduate students and the international visitors account for 7.4 per cent of A&M first summer session main campus enrollment.

International Programs brought about one-third of the foreign students to A&M under Agency contract from the Dominican Republic, East Pakistan and Tunisia.

Following the Dominican Republic with the largest enrollment are India, Pakistan, China, Tunisia, Mexico, Argentina, the United Arab Republic, Venezuela, Iraq and Canada.

Due to enrollment of 66 Dominican students, A&M has more international students from the Mediterranean area (37 per cent of the foreign enrollment) than any other region of the world, according to International Student Advisor Robert L. Melcher's figures.

Twenty-one per cent of the 370 are from Southeast Asian countries, 15 per cent South and Central America and 10 per cent Far East.
