

Driver Education Tops At A&M

Providing better drivers education for Texas' teenagers has moved the state from a mediocre position to one of national prominence, with Texas A&M playing an important role.

Dr. Leslie V. Hawkins of A&M's Industrial Education Department is spearheading a summer program to train non-professional teachers' aides and professional teaching supervisors to meet the growing demand for drivers education in Texas high schools.

The program is in its second year and Dr. Hawkins feels the results have been successful.

"Schools have accepted the responsibility to make drivers education available to all students, but training qualified instructors has been a problem in some areas," he said.

A&M is helping solve this problem through a summer program financed through the governor's office from federal funds. It is the only program of its kind in the nation.

The basic idea is to employ non-professional teachers to instruct the students, with professional supervisors directing the programs, Dr. Hawkins explained.

Currently A&M is training 59 teacher aides and 53 certified teachers at the A&M Research Annex. The aides take a six-week course and the regular teachers are enrolled in a four-week supervisors training program.

About one-third of both classes are made up of women, Dr. Hawkins noted.

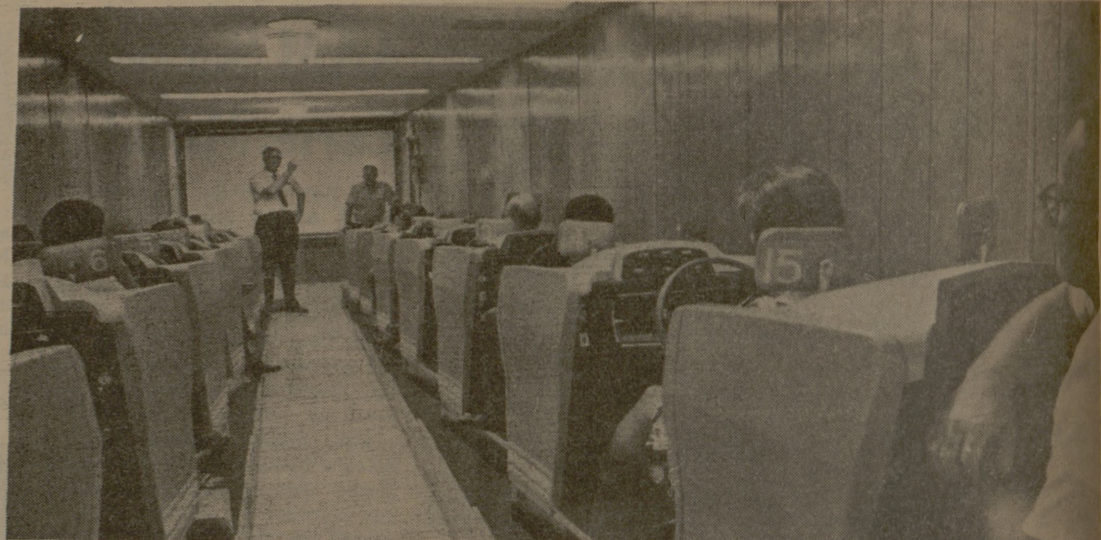

During 1968, the first year of the program, 54 teachers assistants and 44 certified instructors completed the courses.

The program is financed thru a $143,000 National Highway Safety Act grant. It is administered through the governor's office to the Texas Education Agency with A&M providing the facilities, instructors and curriculum.

"The aides must have a high school education, be at least 21-years-old, have a clear driving record and be recommended by school officials," Dr. Hawkins said.

"Enrollment in the aide courses consists of school district bus drivers, housewives, salesmen, law enforcement personnel and retired armed forces people—all interested in part-time or full-time instructor assignments to supplement their income."

SIMULATED TRAINING

Dr. Leslie V. Hawkins, standing, gives instructions to 16 members of a drivers education class receiving training in a Link Driving Trainer. The simulator is one of two operated by Texas A&M during its summer school for teaching assistants and aide supervisors. The instruction is similar to that received by pilots with a movie projector used to project driving situations on a movie screen.
