Ski trip tale

 recording of a woman in tenth month of labor.

There was no cover charge, but a very healthy looking waiter made sure you ordered drinks, and at a buck a beer, one quickly learned to dance a lot and drink very slowly.

The skiing was fantastic, but some soon headed for other daytime diversions. We were just outside the little village of Argentiere, and a 20 minute shuttle bus ride away from Chamonix, the largest village in the valley. Chamonix was the perfect picture of Alpine France, with little shops and stores, and pastry shops on every street. My gosh, the pastries! The French have some combination of just about every edible substance made into a pastry, and one would wander into one of these shops and take a good 10 minutes just deciding which ones to try first. But they were all delicious, and nobody was ever disappointed in his or her choice. The trick, though, was to know when to stop. I never quite mastered that.

From Chamonix ran the night trains to Paris and Rome, and for $40 round trip you could jaunt off to gather a little culture at one of these beautiful cities. Also from Chamonix ran the steepest cable car in the world, heading up the side of Mont Blanc to a fantastic view of the entire valley from a point called the Aquille du Midi, then continuing on another cable car on over into Italy to the town of Courmayeur. The ride was not for anyone with a weak stomach, so some chose the easier way — through the mountain with the longest tunnel in the world, almost 7 miles long, under the highest mountain in Europe. 10 dark minutes after we entered the tunnel, we were in Italy.

We stopped at a little Italian restaurant called La Maison du Fillippo, and for two solid hours sat through four courses of the most fantastic meal, including the first course with 16 different dishes. The waitress winced when we ordered Coke with the meal, and when she told the cook, he—well, never mind what the cook said. It was in Italian, to be sure, but unprintable, all the same.

The days went by far too fast, but we made up for it with the long, late parties every night. Cheese and beef fondue, dishes particular to France, were the star of every get together, with wine, of course. But the days escaped us too fast, and long before anyone was ready, it was time to head for Texas. We loaded up, said goodbye to our French friends, and off to Geneva we went for the flight home.

We were surprised there with the news that the airport was fogged in, and we could spend the day shopping and sightseeing in old Geneva. By eleven that night all the skiers, the car drivers, and the independent travelers had exchanged the best of their different stories and the fog still remained. The task of putting 250 tired people on a night train to Zurich was monumental, but that was the only place clear enough for our plane to pick us up, so after a six hour train ride and some really fancy baggage handling, we were at the Zurich airport ready to head for home.

The duty free store was void of booze after we had shopped it, and at $3 a quart, one couldn't help but bring in his quota. Those who were of age, of course. Of course.

By noon we were off, and it was a quiet plane full of people, to say the least. Some sleeping, some reading, and some just remembering the fun and funny things, like the girl who had asked me why the European cars all had yellow lights. We had both been enjoying the local brew that night, and when I told her that they were fog lights, she misunderstood and thought I said "frog lights". I didn't want to disappoint the sweet young thing in her wonderment, so I made up an appropriate story to go along with her misunderstanding, and to this day she thinks frogs are scared of yellow lights, so they stay off the roads. I mean, after all, we never did see a single frog on the roads in France. . . .

Anyway, after a stop in Pittsburgh to clear customs, and a sad goodbye to our University of Kentucky friends in Cincinnati we winged our way to Houston, arriving 24 hours later than scheduled due to that fog. But the thing most asked as we got off the plane? When are we going again, let us know as soon as next year's trip is planned, we can't wait to get back! The cost was minimal, but the experiences were at a maximum. The Travel Committee had successfully completed another phase of its purpose: let Aggies see the world, and let the world see Aggies. And see we did. With our pockets full of assorted change in French francs, Italian Lire, and Swiss francs, all the participants look back at the fun, and forward to next year's trip. It's only eleven months away. . . .
