lem of ends and means, he said. "I want to argue that man is the end, subject matter the means and society the result," he told participants in the three-day Industrial Arts Association conferench that attacted more than 500 industrial arts teachers. Frymier said what students need to learn—the curriculum has conventionally been determined by drawing upon three basic sources. These are what is known about the nature of knowledge, the nature of society and

Today's public school education the nature of the individual, he explained.

What seems to happen is that those who build programs and curricula "subconsciously order these sources in hierarchical terms in their own mond, according to their own values," he explained.

Frymier said to presume that what we know about the nature of the individual is of most importance and the other factors are of secondary importance represents a very difficult kind of philosophical position about education.

"In my judgement," he added, "school sould be established and maintained by society for the purpose of serving the needs of those inside the institution rather than those outside."

Frymier said such a reorientation must be a tremendous task, but that the burgeoning number of forces tending to fractionize public education today indicate it is necessary.

He believes the private school movement, pressure for community control, the "vulture plan" which advocates parents be given money to spend on their children's education at whichever school they choose, performance contracting and the teacher negotiation movement are among the fractionizing elements.

LA students may interview about language

Representatives of the Liberal Arts Student Council will meet in Room 108 of the Academic Building tonight to discuss plans for surveying faculty and students in the Modern Language Department.

The group which includes James The scholarship is a memorial Mendl (Jr-ML), Rebecca Kirby to the late E. J. Kyle, who was (Sr-ML), Sylvia King (Jr-Eng), Notre Dame professor dean of agriculture for 35 years at and Michael Hardin (Sr-Hist) will conduct interviews of a sampling Henry C. Thacher Jr. of Leschber is the son of Mr. and of teachers in modern language and students, both majoring in modern language and majoring in other subjects and taking language courses, in an attempt to ascertain whether changes should be made within the Modern Language Department and if so what changes should be made.

The committee grew out of complaints from council members that modern language requirements are both too stiff and too lax.

Mrs. King said the interviews will be made pending the approval of Modern Language Department Head Jack A. Dabbs.

In other council business, Associate Dean of Liberal Arts Charles McCandless suggested that all seniors in liberal arts fill out a list of their college achievements within their department and a copy of this coud be sent to the College of Liberal Arts. The college is often used as a reference for graduates applying for jobs, Mc-
