Safe, attractive, low-cost car sought

FARMINGDALE, N. Y. (AP) — Run the car into a stone wall at 50 miles per hour and walk away?

Yes, that's the Fairchild Hiller Corp's vision as it develops an experimental supersafe car.

"You may have a few bruises and perhaps a broken nose, but you'll survive," says George Hildebrand, the engineer in charge of the project for Fairchild Hiller.

The United States Department of Transportation - sponsored project envisions a car in which passengers can survive a roll at 70 mph, and sustain a 30 mph crash broadside with little damage.

The Transportation Department's grant to Fairchild is $4.5 million. Hildebrand says the two cars designed under the grant will be ready by next January.

The cars will compete against federally sponsored prototypes built by AMF Inc. and General Motors. The winner will be given federal funds to continue development.

The government specifications call for a car body capable of sustaining a 10 mph collision undamaged and a gasoline tank that won't spill in a crash.

The car also has to be attractive in design and price and have improved braking, steering and handling.

"We want to show the level of safety to which a standard car can be brought," Hildebrand says. "It has to be meaningful, life-saving and not penalizing to the owner in cost."

For protection in front-end crashes, Hildebrand is developing a hydraulic bumper which will be located about 18 inches in front of the engine and radiator. It extends another 12 inches automatically when the car reaches a speed of about 35 mph, and can absorb a 50 mph impact.

To protect passengers during broadside collisions doors will have double locks and be fitted with energy-absorbing materials. High sills will prevent doors from buckling inward.

While the car would sustain some damage in a crash of 40 mph, says Hildebrand, the passengers would be safely cradled in steel.

An energy-absorbing arrangement attached to the rear bumpers of the car would protect passengers in a rear-end crash.

War protestors shift tactics

By JAMES R. JACKSON

A new form of antiwar sentiment, national and international, is beginning to heat up, according to an article in the SMU school newspaper.

While rallies, marches and demonstrations still are utilized as expressions of anti-war feeling, the new innovation in war protest is a people's peace treaty, the story says.

The preface to the treaty reads: "Be it known that the American and Vietnamese people are not enemies. The war is carried out in the names of the people of the United States and South Vietnam but without our consent. It destroys the land and people of Vietnam. It drains America of its youth and its honor."

The treaty was negotiated by a 15-member delegation of student body presidents and college editors of the National Student Association (NSA) who met with national student unions from North and South Vietnam last August. The groups had to meet in North Vietnam since the South Vietnamese government would not allow the delegation to enter South Vietnam.

People's peace treaty will be used to support and center the antiwar activity scheduled for this spring on college campuses across the nation, according to the article in the SMU paper.

Massive ratification is expected for the treaty.

Kate Millet, author of the current best-seller, "Sexual Politics", spoke out for women's lib at Emory University in Atlanta, Ga., according to the school newspaper there.

Highlights of her speech included defining the goals of the Women's Liberation movement, relating the term "sexual politics" to sociophysiological factors, tracing the development of the differentiation of sexuality, and emphasizing revolution as a mass means of human growth.

The speaker cited the mass media for failing to communicate an accurate definition to the public of what Women's Liberation is saying: "The media are happy to call it bra-burning."

Millet illustrated this by a recent advertisement which read, "I dreamed I went to a Women's Lib rally in by Maidenform bra."

Kate Millet described the difficulty in proving to parents that they treat children differently. As an example, she illustrated how strangers won't relate to an infant until they know its sex.

Males and females are taught to aspire to different characteristics; males having more aggression, intellect and efficacy; women more docility and "virtue, alias sexual repression." The difference is rationalized as being "nature."

Nixon OKs live interviews

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon has offered live one-hour interviews to the three major television networks — the first scheduled for next Monday.

Nixon made the offer in alphabetical order, Press Secretary Ronald L. Ziegler said Wednesday, and Monday's interview will be with Howard K. Smith of the American Broadcasting Co.

ABC chose the questioner, said Ziegler.

In the weeks or months ahead, he said, the Columbia Broadcasting System and the National Broadcasting Co. — in that order — will be scheduling similar one-hour interviews by a single questioner.

Former student killed in action

A Texas A&M former student previously listed as missing in action in Vietnam, has officially been declared killed in action by the U. S. Air Force.

Lt. Clyde W. (Bill) Wells, class of 1966, was shot down over hostile territory in Vietnam on March 1, 1969.

The Association of Former Students was notified Wednesday about the change from MIA to KIA.

Campbell, son of Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Campbell of 512 Richardson, Longview, was a math major, executive officer of Squadron 7 and president of the Deep East Texas Hometown Club.

He is survived by his widow, Dianne, and two daughters of Bossier City, La.
