

Archeology, Indians Enter Liberal Arts Curriculum

Anthropology begins to take its place in the College of Liberal Arts as two new courses are made ready for the fall semester.

In its second year, the emerging Department of Sociology and Anthropology adds archeology and the North American Indians to its established introductory and cultural courses.

Dr. Vaughn M. Bryant, A&M's first anthropologist, related, "Since student interest and response has been so favorable, we have expanded our faculty and curriculum in anthropology for the coming academic year." Dr. Bryant added that over 350 students were enrolled in the two courses last year.

The new addition to the A&M faculty is Harry J. Shafer. Well experienced in this field, Shafer has organized many archeological surveys and excavations throughout the state for the Texas Archeological Salvage Project for the past 10 years. He also worked on the 1971 Tabun Excavation Team in Israel which partially redefined the cultural development of the Middle East for the last 100,000 years.

Shafer is a former instructor of anthropology at the University of Texas at Austin and is a doctorate candidate for May 1973.

By the 1973-74 academic year, it is hoped by university officials that anthropology will be available as a degree major in the College of Liberal Arts.

Dr. Bryant informed, "As anthropology receives additional faculty members, we shall be able to expand our present curriculum. We hope to be able to offer students at least two new courses every semester for the next few years in addition to the basic introductory level courses which will be taught each semester."

On the role of anthropology at A&M, Dr. Bryant commented, "As I envision it, it is to help not only A&M students, but all of mankind gain a sense of understanding, compassion, and tolerance for his fellow man, and at the same time gain an appreciation of his biological and cultural heritage."

Dr. Bryant also suggested that the course of study cannot solve all the problems of the world, but that "the application of anthropological techniques can be used to answer many of man's questions concerning his past and present self."

Dr. Robert Berg Becomes New Director of Research

Dr. Robert R. Berg, formerly Associate Dean of Geosciences at A&M, assumed duties July 1 at the newly created post of director of research for the university.

The new post, created by President Jack Williams, is to provide for development and support of varied research programs which were being conducted outside of the existing agricultural and engineering experiment stations.

"Texas benefits from all of the research of the university through improvements in education, help to farms and industries, aids to management of natural resources and development of methods to reduce environmental pollution, among many other benefits," Dr. Williams said.

The new Office of University Research, which Berg will head, will operate under Dr. John C. Calhoun Jr., Vice President for Academic Affairs.

Trew Is Leader

Dr. E. M. (Ted) Trew, formerly assistant director of the Cooperative Extension Service for the University of Kentucky, has assumed the duties of the state agricultural program leader for the Texas Agricultural Extension Service.

Trew is also a former extension specialist and assistant dean of agriculture at A&M. He will fill the position recently vacated by the retirement of A. H. (Fred) Walker.

In his position, Trew will now provide leadership for a statewide staff of more than 150 Extension agricultural specialists.
