

Deepwater Terminal Experts Convene In Houston

ational experts on deepwater terminals will convene in Houston at the fifth annual meeting of the Association of Sea Grant institutions. The three-day conference, beginning Tuesday at the Astro-Hotel, is hosted by A&M. Topics for discussion at the water terminals session include the need for such facilities, environmental considerations in construction and use, and engineering and economic aspects. Paul A. Amundsen, executive director of the American Association of Port Authorities, will speak on "Who Should Operate the Offshore Terminals... What Are the Options?" Brig. Gen. K. B. Cooper, deputy director of civil works for the U. S. Army Corps of Engineers, will discuss "Deepwater Ports: How Do We Get There From Here?" Giving the view of an oil company will be J. S. Wilwerding of Shell Oil Corporation's division of transportation and distribution economics. The session on environmental considerations of deepwater terminals, chaired by William S. Gaither, dean of marine studies at the University of Delaware, includes these speakers and topics: Roy W. Hann, head of TAMU's environmental engineering group, "Environmental Aspects of a Texas Superport;" Donald L. Maurer, University of Delaware, "Environmental Vulnerability of the Delaware Bay Area to Deepwater Ports;" and Stephen S. Moore, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, "Some Aspects of Deepwater Terminal Site Selection in Northern New England Coastal Areas." Reporting on the current status of alternatives to building deep-water terminals will be R. W. Black, program manager for ports and terminals in the U. S. Maritime Administration. James R. Bradley, head of TAMU's Industrial Economics Research division, will speak on Gulf Coast deepwater terminal studies, including the socio-economic investigations now underway. Last week Bradley disclosed preliminary results of the study, indicating that a deep-water terminal off the Texas coast could have an impact of $4.5 billion each year, creating 23,200 new jobs in the state by 1980 with an annual payroll of $239 million. Partially supporting the investigation is Texas A&M's Sea Grant College Program, along with the Texas Superport Study Corporation, a Houston firm. Other deepwater terminal speakers are Ira Dyer and Ernst

Frankel, Massachusetts Institute of Technology transportation specialists. The conference has attracted over 200 representatives from 27 states involved with the National Sea Grant Program, National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, U. S. Department of Commerce. More than $22,350,868 has been invested by Sea Grant in programs of research, education, and advisory services directed toward wise use and management of coastal and marine resources, including the Great Lakes.
