Voter Turnout Sets Record

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
This year's presidential election turnout was a contrast in numbers. An estimated 77.5 million voters showed up at the polls, adding up to the highest turnout in history. But the total represents only 56 per cent of the potential electorate, making it the worst showing in almost a quarter of a century.

Enough new voters were created through the lowering of the voting age to 18 to swell the voting age population by 11.5 million to a total of 140 million. But the turnout for the last five presidential elections averaged 62 per cent, and the last time it slipped below 60 per cent was in 1948 when only 52 per cent turned out to elect Harry Truman.

Most states had record totals this year, but some actually had fewer voters than in 1968. Washington, D. C., whose heavily black voting population gave George McGovern one of his few bright spots in the returns, actually had 41,000 fewer voters than in the last presidential election.

Election officials said the turnout of young voters was generally heavy, but accurate measurements were only possible in university areas.

In Chicago, about 80 per cent of the registered University of Illinois student voters showed up at the polls to give McGovern a 2-1 margin; a heavy turnout of student voters in Massachusetts — the only state carried by McGovern — gave the South Dakota Democrat a 6-1 margin, and Indiana University student precincts showed up 2 to 1 for McGovern.
