our design specifications, it would weigh nine pounds," suggested Rice, who has worked in Houston construction. Legs attach in clothespin fashion to the 34-inch-long I-beam crosspiece. Two expansion clamps lock the legs in place. A strap for making a tight storage bundle snaps out of the way on the bottom of the beam when the sawhorse is in use.

legs, but feel button rivets would be best for mass production. The group determined through Alenco in Bryan that a metalworker could build the horse in 15 minutes. "The average person can't build a sawhorse," Rice noted. "If this one could be produced economically, and we see no reason why it couldn't, it should sell readily on the retail market."
