

International Money Crisis Undermining U.S. Dollar

LONDON (AP)—The two-week international money crisis undermining the strength of the U.S. dollar appeared Thursday to be headed for a climax, perhaps by the weekend.

The value of the American currency was particularly threatened in West Germany by money dealers seeking to buy marks in anticipation the German currency will be revalued, despite Bonn's resolve not to do so.

The dollar-dumping in West Germany and other money markets reflected a widespread judgment that the dollar's official value is pegged higher than its real worth, and that sooner or later the official rate will have to give.

Washington wants the readjustment to come by revaluation of foreign currencies, particularly the West German mark and the Japanese yen. But neither the Japanese nor the Germans, so far, have been willing to undercut their export chances.

If their currencies were revalued as the United States wants, imports such as Volkswagens and transistor radios would be more expensive in U.S. stores. And conversely, U.S. exports would be cheaper in Germany and Japan, giving U.S. traders an edge.

Reports from dealers in Amsterdam and Zurich said Middle East government banks joined the dollar-selling wave Thursday, putting more pressure on the U.S. currency. According to these accounts the Middle East banks, which receive heavy dollar payments for oil, were cashing in these holdings for West German marks.

Earlier in the week, the bulk of the dollar sales were said to be from funds deposited in Europe.

Partly as a result of the new influx from the Middle East, West Germany's state bank was forced to take in an unprecedented $1.7 billion Thursday, the biggest one-day amount of support buying in the current crisis.

The Germans, under international agreements, are pledged to step in and buy dollars to keep the U.S. currency from falling below the permitted floor rate of 3.1500 marks. But despite the massive support operation, the dollar closed in Frankfurt at 3.1495 marks, fractionally below the floor.

This was because the state bank, as it usually does, left the market an hour before close. It is virtually certain to step in again when the market reopens Friday. Otherwise the dollar would be in effect devalued and the international exchange rates worked out in Washington in the Smithsonian agreement of December 1971 could be wrecked. The agreement sealed an 8.57 percent dollar devaluation decided because of earlier pressure on the U.S. currency.

Governors of state banks from leading West European nations were due to meet in Basel, Switzerland, over the weekend to discuss the current crisis. The guidelines of any attempt to resolve the crisis could emerge from that meeting.

Chancellor Willy Brandt's government has repeatedly pledged it will not revalue or let the mark float up. It has promised to continue support buying as long as necessary to maintain the exchange rate.

But speculators are still betting that the Germans will have to give in to combat inflationary pressure and let the mark move up, even if that means export losses for Germany.

The continuing flood of dollar sales in Europe, meanwhile, remains a test of nerves between speculators betting on realigned exchange rates and governments fighting to maintain the current ones.

Japan, like Germany, has a relatively strong currency and has been forced all week to provide heavy support buying to maintain the dollar's yen exchange rate. Like the Germans, the Japanese want to avoid a revaluation that would hurt their exports.

Japan bought an estimated $105 million Thursday.

Dealers in Europe have tended to blame the crisis on the newly announced deficit of $8.5 billion in the U.S. 1972 balance of payments.

NSF Approves A&M Grant

The National Science Foundation has approved second-year funding of $174,700 to A&M for basic studies into the role of hormones in development.

The latest grant brings total funding to $328,700. NSF expects to continue support for three more years, bringing the total grant to $890,000.

Dr. Herbert A. Roller, professor of biology, directs the studies. Dr. Karl H. Dahm, associate professor of biology and chemistry, is co-investigator. The two scientists have worked as a team since 1966 studying insect hormones.

Their work is known internationally, including credit for the isolation, elaboration and chemical synthesis of the juvenile hormone, one of the two hormones in insects which regulate developmental processes.

Those findings have served as a basis for industrial development of hormonal methods of insect control.

Ag Engineering Researchers Study Pollution Control At Border Station

Researchers from A&M's Environmental Engineering Department have returned from Laredo where follow-up studies on pollution control at the border crossing station have been made.

Dr. M. P. Boyce, Dr. J. M. Hughes and graduate students Gary Rollins and Anant Kumar Desai found that ventilation systems installed following environmental engineering studies at the border crossing facility were working as expected, but a need for more ventilation during certain peak periods of activity was discovered as a result of the follow-up study.

"The original problem was caused by heavy traffic flow through the covered inspection station," Dr. Hughes said. "We found a ventilation system that took care of most of the exhaust fumes that were making inspection personnel ill, but there is still a problem when traffic is heavy and wind is at low velocity."

Before the ventilation systems were installed, carbon monoxide was found to be over 99 parts per million under the facility's roof. By comparison, bad days in Chicago found 56 ppm in the air, and Los Angeles had 46 ppm.

Measurements taken during the recent follow-up showed a reduction in carbon monoxide to 20-40 ppm at the inspection station.

Dr. Hughes said check-point personnel were pleased with the results of the initial ventilation installation, and Jim Blackstone, regional General Services Administration official from Fort Worth, said GSA was moving as quickly as possible to install the additional suggested ventilation systems.

The Laredo station is the largest border-crossing point between the United States and Mexico, and its low-lying position prevents natural wind ventilation from occurring.
