Shift Pedal Is A Challenge For Female Bus Driver

By M. I. WARWICK

The guys expected her to be a seven-foot, 300-pound moose. But Debbie Killgore can't even quite reach the shift pedal, so she sits halfway up on the driver's seat. She uses a back prop for comfort, but said her back was killing her. This particular bus isn't her favorite one anyway.

"I heard this was a hard job to get," recounted the 19-year-old shuttle bus driver, "but apparently they wanted a female. My roommate's boyfriend tried, but they said they didn't need anybody. Then I tried and they gave it to me."

A&M's first woman bus driver began her job about three weeks ago, and in spite of the awkwardness of driving the tank-like machine, this petite brunette appears quite competent behind the wheel.

"I like to drive. When I saw these buses I thought, 'Man! That'd be fun!' I guess I got the job because it'd be a novelty having a girl driver," Debbie said as she shifted into second gear. A friend said this was just like Debbie, to do something different.

The 5-foot-4½ horticulture major does not look the part she plays. Her hair is cut in a long shag and her eyes protected by sunglasses.

However, she claims she knows more than the average girl about cars. That helps when her Toyota breaks down.

Debbie is emphatic when denying an affiliation with Women's Lib. Some commented at first, 'Oh, Women's Lib, huh?' But that had nothing to do with it. I'm not a liber at all."

Debbie said she gets a lot of stares. "I've been called the 'sexiest bus driver' and the 'best looking bus driver' but that's because I'm the only female," she added modestly. She screeched the door open at a stop by the old biology building, and struggling to restrain the pup, murmured, "I shouldn't have brought him."

She expressed a genuine delight in her 7-11 a.m. workday, and smiles a lot during the rounds. The student chauffeur says she is not an extrovert. She cast a friendly wave to a small blond boy playing near Plantation Oaks Apartments, and a happy nod to a passing driver.

"Last week in the morning it started out just kind of ugly. But then the sky got really black and it just started pouring. I like this job because it's fun watching the elements change like that." The small but able bus mistress knows that any office job is not for her. Her major field will allow her to work in the open too.

Lecture Cancelled

The Physics Department has announced cancellation of the Physics Colloquium presentation scheduled for 4 p.m. Thursday.

The speaker was to have been Dr. Jon Weisheit, staff scientist at Lawrence Livermore Laboratory in Livermore, Calif.

"It can get boring going around in circles for four hours, but sometimes I have people come and talk to me, my friends, and of course I meet people, some people I don't want to meet."

At times Debbie admits to feeling unfeminine about driving a clumsy bus, but being independently minded, she reassures herself. "It's just a job. I don't care what people think."

It seemed that the muscles of a man would be needed to steer the lumbering bus back onto Highway 30.

"Uh, uh. I won't get any muscles. But I've noticed my arms aren't so flabby now." A silver bracelet shifted on a small arm.

The bus she normally drives, because of its catering to the small and less strong driver, is temporarily out of service. She scooted uncomfortably in the seat with a rigid spine remembering, "It's such a nice bus."

Come by and test drive MAZDA a rotary engine.
