Double Tuition Plan Proposed

A recent proposal to more than double undergraduate tuition charges at the nation's public colleges and universities was denounced today by Helen D. Wise, president of the 1.4 million-member National Education Association, as "an attempt to roll back the clock in higher education for lower and middle income families."

The plan, recommended by the business-oriented Committee for Economic Development (CED), essentially calls for decreased state and federal subsidies of higher education and is aimed in part at narrowing the tuition gap between private and public colleges. Its net effect would be increased financial pressures on middle income families.

"This plan aims a direct blow at the children of working and middle income families by sharply limiting their prospects for a four-year college education," said Dr. Wise.

"Its immediate effect," she pointed out, "will be to force many parents to seek commercial loan money at exorbitant interest rates. If such money can be found in today's tight market, many families will be unable to afford the higher cost, and students will be forced to drop out of college."

"This, in effect, closes the door to higher education for a whole generation of moderate-income youth seeking to better themselves," she added.

Since its founding in 1942, the CED, which has headquarters in Washington, D. C., has been a powerful force in the nation's economic affairs. Its 200 members are mainly executives of major corporations but include a smattering of educators.

While its report does not stress the issue, CED comes down strongly on the side of increased public aid for struggling institutions, and decreased federal institutional aid to public colleges and universities.

The latter position is in line with Nixon Administration policy, but is directly antithetical to provisions of the landmark Higher Education Amendments of 1972 — federal legislation strongly supported by NEA which has since fallen heir to the Administration's deceptive funding practices.

One effect of the CED plan would be to make private colleges more competitive with public institutions and thus "throttle an already badly squeezed system of state colleges," according to NEA Higher Education Director Charles Bob Simpson.
