TAMU becomes focal point

Bryant notes that pollen dispersed by seed-bearing plants is immune to human gastric acids. "The human digestive system doesn't touch them," he said.

Thus, pollen eaten by man is excreted and can form a permanent locked-in record of diet. Human feces in the form of coprolites have become extremely important in archeological research.

Whether the pollen comes from coprolites or soil samples is immaterial to analysis. By determining what plants the pollen came from, the palynologist has a "clock" to past geologic time, distribution of plant life and, in the case of coprolites, a key for working on migration patterns of early man.

Bryant's study of the Boriack Bog near Lexington reveals the Lee County area west of Bryan was not always a post oak savannah. It was part of a deciduous forest about 15,000 years ago, with alder, maple, birch and spruce among other trees. He said it is one of the best preserved bogs in Texas.

Besides the Peru research, Bryant has analyzed material from a Neolithic farm on Cyprus, Neanderthal coprolites from Lazareth, France; an early Israeli farming community and has been contacted by University of Chicago

Mid-East archeologist Robert Braidwood who believes he has found one of the world's earliest agriculture sites in Turkey. Extensive specialized training and study is required to become an anthropological palynologist, Bryant said. One of only three scientists in the U. S. trained to use the tool, he has contemporaries at Arizona State and Washington State Universities.

Bryant says there is more than enough work around for the trio. What is needed for someone entering the field, he thinks, is primary specialization in both botany and anthropology, from which ethnobotany derives. "A botanist is usually not equipped to ask an archeologist the right questions," he said. "They must be able to communicate properly."

The science of palynology was developed in the early 1900s. Dr. Eric Callen perfected the technique of human coprolite analysis at McGill University in Canada during the late 1950s and early 1960s. He died while working in Peru in 1970. Callen's coprolite reference materials were given to the TAMU lab. Bryant calls the Callen collection the "finest of its kind in North America and probably the world."

Another specialist adding to TAMU's anthropology program is Dr. Harry Shafer, who teaches the state's only regularly-offered course on Indians of Texas. Shafer worked on the Texas Archeological Salvage Project of the Texas Park Service eight years, "digging up the whole state of Texas," Bryant said, before acquiring his degrees. "Harry knows all the archeologists in Texas on a first name basis," Bryant added, "and knows as much about Texas archeology as anyone else in the field."

Shafer is a specialist in lithic technology, capable of classifying arrowheads and points not only by their shape but by methods of hand manufacture.

Shafer opened with TAMU students in anthropology TAMU's first excavation. It is located on an artifact-laden Indian campsite near the Brazos River, on property owned by Tony Varisco.

Shafer has also had overseas archeological work, at the Tabun Homo erectus site in Israel.

Bryant described one practical aspect of the work, apart from discovering how man's ancestors evolved, adapted and survived.

"If the worst comes," Bryant commented on the current economic situation, "I know I can take my family to West Texas and live off the land. My research has shown the staple of early man's diet there was agave and cactus pads he threw in the fire to singe off spines, sliced up and boiled in water. He survived on it."

TEXAS A&M'S FIRST ARCHEOLOGY EXCAVATION — Anthropology student at Texas A&M University carefully sift soil from a dig for artifacts at an old Indian campsite on the Brazos River. Under the guidance of Dr. Harry Shafer, they are getting their hands dirty in one of the practical aspects of anthropology. Several stone implements were found on the Tony Varisco farm site in Brazos County.

'The Exorcist' a hit in Dallas

DALLAS (AP) — An Interstate-ABC Theaters spokesman said Tuesday the film "The Exorcist" showing here already has set a one-week, all-time attendance record in Dallas but not without its side effects. "I don't think any picture has affected people so emotionally like this one has," said Francis Barr. Barr said a number of people have fainted while watching the feature while others have left vomiting. Long lines have formed around the Wilshire Theater in sub-freezing temperatures since the movie opened. Episcopal Canon Courtland Moore said the Dallas Diocese has received numerous requests for rites of exorcism, upon which the movie is based, since the film opened in Dallas.
