Overdue staff shake-up leads toward new focus

By ROXIE HEARN
Staff Writer

This past summer the National Student Lobby (NSL) underwent a long overdue staff shake-up and is now aiming toward a new focus, said Carol Moore, an A&M student and a board member of the organization.

Moore, who serves on the external affairs committee of student government, explained the changes as a "retreat and regroup" situation.

The organization is being served by a new executive director who has brought about many changes, said Moore.

"Our communications director was fired, our legislative director and our publications director both quit and at least five others in lesser positions quit."

"These people had been in under the old director's philosophy—we needed a new direction."

"We went from no files, no records, no bookkeeping and no publicity to a new sense of order."

The group represents students, she stressed and has dedicated itself to "combating the money crunch on campus," said Moore.

"We believe in equal access to political and educational systems in the United States," she said, "but the only way this can come about is if everybody can afford to go to college."

For this reason NSL works toward the expansion of basic grants, the student loans, and college work-study programs.

"We try to stay away from the 'sexy issues' like abortion or amnesty, and focus on those we can have some control over; things which concern students as students," Moore said.

Presently NSL is completing its annual referendum. According to Moore, last year's questions were poorly worded and ill-defined and she is working to make them "as clear as possible" this year.

"We're asking for constituent input so we'll know what issues the students want us to lobby for," Moore said.

The group is also presenting the foreign students' view of a recent change in the policy of the U.S. Naturalization and Immigration Office.

As of April 19, work permits were no longer granted by the foreign students' advisers, but through the regional office. Fewer applications are being accepted by them in an effort to increase the job market for American students, said Moore.

As a result, work permits are extremely difficult for foreign students to obtain, she said.

Moore, who travels to Washington, D.C. every three or four months, describes being a boardmember as a three-pronged position: national, regional and individual. Nationally, she is concerned with who's hired, who's fired, what legislation they are concerned with and the progress of the organization's fund-raising operation, Moore said.

On the regional level, Moore is one of four field-persons for Region II, composed of 14 states. She appoints state coordinators and keeps abreast of student lobbying in each of the states.

"Individually, I'm just a person interested in the issue of NSL. I stay involved in it as pertinent to A&M."

"A&M is a conservative campus and we need to see our kind of focus is kept," Moore.

Last year, some 12,000 smokers didn't think when they were in the forest.

They dropped their lit cigarettes instead of crushing them dead out.

And so 12,000 forest fires started unnecessarily. And about 60 million trees died.

So if you smoke in the forest, put the life out of your cigarettes. No dead cigarette ever killed a tree.
