The press prints the paper from an aluminum plate.

A photograph is made of each separate page

The news is printed on long rolls of paper which are cut apart to form the separate pages.

The papers are bundled and marked for their destination.

The Battalion staff of student editors and reporters work Monday through Thursday nights writing stories and headlines. At 8 a.m. Tuesdays through Fridays the TAMU Printing Center begins producing The Battalion. First, the copy is translated by key punch units into strips of tickertape. The tickertape is then fed through a computer which sets photographic images of copy and headlines onto chemically-treated paper. The computer then rolls the paper into a light-tight cylinder and the paper is processed through a photographic developer. The copy is then pasted onto a full-sized dummy sheet which is taken to the photo and dual aids department. PVA is the page to produce a negative which is then used to expose a chemically-treated aluminum sheet. A red laquer is applied to aluminum and adds a thin coat to exposed areas. The aluminum sheets are attached to a cylinder the press. As the press rolls, a rubber cylinder spreads ink onto aluminum and the ink sticks to those areas covered by the red laquer. Another rubber cylinder takes the ink off the aluminum and transfers the ink to the paper. This printing method is named offset. The papers are then bundled for distribution.
