Engineers to help small businesses

Small businesses in Texas are to get help with possible health hazards.

TAMU industrial engineers believe the purposes of the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970, concerning small businesses, may be best served by informing management about the intent of the Act and how to meet the requirements.

"Today, it is recognized that agencies of the government are incapable of conducting health and safety inspections of all business establishments for hazards associated with job health and safety," explained project director Dr. Richard Konzen. "As a consequence, small businesses and industries are not receiving the services intended by the Act."

The team of engineers contracted with the American Industrial Hygiene Association to develop a means by which training and consultative services in industrial hygiene can be provided to small businesses and industries. The contract requires the establishment of an Industrial Hygiene Center which will provide training in the form of short courses on the Texas A&M campus.

The courses will include: Industrial Hygiene; Industrial Toxicology; Industrial Hygiene Instrumentation; Ventilation of Industrial Processes; and Radiation Hazards. These five courses are to be presented January through May, with three of the courses repeated during the latter part of the year. "No registration fee is required for attendance at the courses," Konzen said.

Another important facet of the program is a walk-through survey by the TAMU team, conducted at the request of the individual industry, to provide assistance in the recognition and prevention or control aspects of occupational health exposures. This service is limited to small industries within a radius of approximately 200 miles of the TAMU campus.
