Highway break-down help studied by Ag researchers

By FRANK K. CHOI
Special to The Batt

If your car is broken down on a highway, you would probably hope that someone will stop and offer help. What is the chance of that happening?

A field research project has been recently conducted by a group of TAMU sociology students on Highway 6 and Highway 21. The group consisted of two middle-aged women, two young girls, two young men—all are whites—and two young blacks. The purpose of the research was to find out whether Southerners would stop for anyone who needs help or to a specific ethnic group.

Jo Klatt, one of the researchers, said that all members were going out in pairs. Every member will pair other members once in an effort to minimize distortion.

Many hypotheses had been worked out before going out the field and these hypotheses were carefully examined by Dr. Bardin H. Nelson, professor of sociology, Klatt said.

The research was done before nightfall on weekdays only. "Some professors suggested that we should also work at night, but we think it would be dangerous to those female pairs," Klatt said.

After the first week, some of the hypotheses were found to be valid and the result is quite satisfactory, Klatt said.

for a single person in distress rather than for two or more people, regardless of sex and race," Klatt said. "But it was rather strange that more cars stopped for my oriental friend, than any other member in the group."

The researchers observed that a car approaching in a group would likely not stop, while if only one car passed by, it would more likely stop and offer help, Klatt said.

Another member, Doris Turner, said, "It agreed with our hypothesis that people would refuse to offer help when there is an audience present."

It was also observed that pickup truck drivers and middle-aged people usually stop and offer help, Klatt said.

Sure. It's surprisingly dry, not sweet. Light-bodied, not heavy. Delightfully smooth. And so good mixed, it's got to be good un-mixed, right? Try it.
