

Experience preferred

A teacher's record from the professional world may mean more to students than his or her appearance, according to research findings.

James McNamara of the TAMU Educational Administration Department tested students from a professional school at the University of Oregon and found they were impressed more by practical experience than physical appearance.

He presented film skits of two "applicants" for a teaching position. One was modishly dressed with longer hair and turtleneck sweater while the other was traditionally attired in coat and tie.

Each applicant was then given two vitas — one listing a career in teaching as soon as he graduated from college and the other listing several professional jobs away from the campus.

McNamara said that the students voted the wide-based work experience more acceptable, even though one group saw it in conjunction with the traditionally dressed applicant and another group saw it along with the modishly attired man.

Interestingly, said McNamara, the term "nontraditional" was attached to both men who had the professional job background, even though one appeared to be traditional in dress and manner.

Department head retires

Dr. Harrison E. Hierth will resign as English Department head to resume fulltime teaching and research.

Dean of Liberal Arts Dr. W. David Maxwell said the resignation will become effective Sept. 1.

A search committee has been formed to find Hierth's successor. The new head of the English Department will come from outside the A&M faculty.

Hierth became acting head of the department in 1970. He accepted the post fulltime the following year.

Hierth joined the TAMU faculty in 1946. He has four degrees including the second baccalaureate degree, in education. He received the doctorate at the University of Wisconsin in 1956.

The Illinois native is past president of the Texas Association of Departments of English and the Conference of College Teachers of English in Texas.
