Eight Battalion staff members won awards in competition at the Southwest Journalism Congress last weekend in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. The wins propelled A&M into a tie for third place in the newspaper category with the Oklahoma State O'Collegian and the University of Texas Daily Texan.

Last year, The Battalion placed tenth out of the 16 contest entries from Texas, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana. "Our goal this year was to be in the top half," said editor Greg Moses. "Even though A&M has no magazine to enter, we still ended up seventh in the overall competition." Douglas Winship took first place for best feature photo and Ted Boriskie added another first for best movie review. Steve Ueckert was awarded second place for sports photos. The group also picked up four

The North Texas Daily won the newspaper category and the overall category. The University of Houston was second in the newspaper category and third overall. The University of Texas was second overall.

The Congress also passed resolutions during the general business session. The student division passed a resolution condemning the University of Arkansas, Southern Methodist University, Texas A&M and Baylor for "violating first Amendment freedoms by practicing prior restraint . . . or by using other methods of control not available to every citizen." The general session deleted the names.

The students also passed 5-4 a resolution condemning Louisiana State University for its "sexist" policies during the convention. The University of Houston's resolution was defeated 8-9 in the general session, however.

Another item of business called for more students' input for next year's congress.

Next year's convention at Central State University in Edmond, Oklahoma, will focus on the topic "Campus Newspapers—Who Controls Them? Should Anyone?"
