Prices to alter driving habits

Associated Press

HOUSTON — Deputy Secretary of Transportation John W. Barnum said Tuesday rising gasoline prices will cause American automobile owners to change their driving habits.

"All of us will be driving less and driving more wisely," Barnum said. Barnum said the private car will remain America's primary mode of transportation if it is modified in both form and usage to meet new national concerns.

The automobile must be changed in form and design, he said, and drivers must change their patterns of use to meet current energy and environmental challenges.

"We have to move to a point where automobiles requires less energy, pollutes less and is less of a safety hazard," Barnum said.

"We must pursue the goals of reduced fuel consumption, cleaner air and increased safety deliberately and with the due respect for technical and economic implications but we must pursue them relentlessly."

Barnum spoke at the annual meeting of the international Oil Industry Tires, Batteries, and Accessories Group. The trade organization includes suppliers and marketers of products sold at service stations.

Barnum said he is confident both fuel economy and emission control goals are attainable, adding that the major question is the best way to meet them.

"Fuel economy goals, unlike our emission and safety standards, should continue to be voluntary," he said. "The fact is that fuel economy has market value."

He said there is no need for Congress to legislate better gas mileage.

"At the same time, Congress must be mindful of fuel efficiency when it legislates emission standards," he said.

Goals, Barnum said, can sometimes seem to point in different directions.

"Decreased emissions may exact a fuel economy penalty," he said. "Smaller cars need less fuel, but may be more dangerous. I submit that this is a challenge to our much vaunted American ingenuity and that we will meet the challenge successfully."

Test given six times

Civil Service employment information and test applications are available to Texas A&M students at the Placement Office.

The Professional Administrative Career Exam (PACE) will be given locally, announced Placement Director Louis Van Pelt.

Data on government jobs will be supplied by J. Malon Southland. He attended a recent Texas Gulf Coast Government Recruiting Council meeting in Houston and has information on availability of government jobs, how to apply and details on placement procedures.

"A&M students graduating in May should apply to take the PACE exam as early as possible," Southland said.

The PACE test will be given six times, in November and January through May. Application must be made by the 20th of the preceding month. To take the exam in November, Southland noted, application must be made by Oct. 20.
