Ball runs in their blood

By CAROLYN BLOSSER
Battalion Sports Writer

From 1948 to 1950, Bruce H. Morisse played baseball for Texas A&M. Today, 26 years later, one of his offspring is carrying on the family's athletic tradition. Like father, like son, right?

Well, not quite. Last semester, Morisse's daughter received a scholarship to play basketball for A&M's women's team. Together, they probably make up the first and only father-daughter team to have athletic scholarships at Texas A&M.

Sally Morisse is one of many women who benefit from a rapidly growing women's athletic program, spearheaded by Kay Don, Women's Athletic Director.

"In the three years I've been here," says Morisse, "Miss Don has really brought the women's program up. She has just done a fantastic job.

All of the players have a lot of faith in her — she's really a fine person."

Morisse, a 20-year-old junior from Angleton, started her basketball career in junior high. During her four years at Angleton High, she participated in both track and basketball. Her senior year saw the 1973 AAA State Championship fall Angleton's way.

With such a heralded background, it would seem only natural to continue the pace in college. But Morisse's decision was to discontinue sports during her freshman year.

"I decided not to play that first year because I was tired of it in a way," said Morisse. "I wanted to really concentrate on making good grades."

But the inevitable happened and she began missing the competition. To compensate, she started playing in intramurals only to discover that she still wasn't quite satisfied.

"I didn't like playing in intramurals," she said. "It was a terrible drop down for me because I was used to playing with all-state people."

That following summer, after discussion with her high school coach, Morisse decided to try out for the women's basketball team.

"I was a little scared about playing college ball," she said. "I played much defense in high school and I didn't know how to play court game."

Her fears were soon put to rest. She made the team and was a starter for the entire year. The team compiled a 24-9 record and went on to the playoffs. This year Morisse and the tri-captains and the team will do even better next year.

She learned about her team during finals week of last year. "At first, I was kind of intimidated," she said. "But I was super excited."

Miss Don considered her enough of a player to receive a scholarship. As women's sports at A&M continue to grow, so does the support. "Last year we had a lot of people come to see just our intramurals," she said. "This year a lot of people come up to me and commend me on my play."

Morisse is a marketing major and hopes eventually to work for a department store. Her main interest is in her basketball team completing a full season. And by success means winning.
