'Molecules are little things that are all around us," was one student's synopsis of what they were learning. College Hills had not studied science in detail, although one student said they had been studying space. Once the area of studies was left, the students really started to loosen up. Their love for football, and the Texas Aggies especially, was obvious. Shouts of "I like Bubba Bean" and "I like Ed Simonini" could be heard above all else. Other favorites

'You could do anything you wanted. There would be no school,' one child said. Easton and Hess explain, "A person is conceived to be free when he can do whatever he wishes, an appealing thought to the adult-dominated child." May 26-June 1 — Absentee voting

A second theory Easton and Hess suggest is the fondness the child has for his immediate environment. Some children in The Battalion discussions felt Kansas was a good place to live. Others chose Houston, New York City, and Florida. Almost all chose to live in the United States. The point is that it is beyond the child's capacity to imagine himself living anywhere else but in the United States. Easton and Hess attribute this to "national sentiment, loyalty, patriotism, and love of coun-17-19 and 24-26 in the MSC Student try

When asked "To whom do you take the Pledge of Allegiance?", the answers were flags, United States, and the world. A minority said God. The Battalion's findings relate with Easton and Hess, and their postulate that the formal, solemn atmosphere
