Prosecution calls Patty 'willing converser'

protection against retaliation by SLA sympathizers.

At Bailey's insistence, she said her attorneys had made no effort to secure her release on bail "because I would be safer in the jail." Carter revoked bail shortly after her arrest Sept. 18.

Browning questioned Miss Hearst for about 15 minutes Wednesday, still fuming from his heated exchange with Bailey outside the presence of the jury.

The jurors had been ushered out of the courtroom when Bailey attempted to question his client about last week's bombing at the Hearst castle at San Simeon and a letter threatening her family with more terrorism.

Bailey said the bombing and threat emphasized Miss Hearst's continuing fear of the HARRISES and others "still out to get you."

At the government's request, the jury was removed, and Browning argued that it was not relevant to the case. The judge agreed and cut Bailey off, but Bailey angrily stated for the record that Miss Hearst and her family "are still targets."

Then Browning protested the exclusion of a year from Miss Hearst's story, a time "when we believe she was in Sacramento living with the HARRISES and that based on documents we have and would offer as proof, she was out casing banks with the HARRISES."

"And, I would like to cross-examine Miss Hearst on those documents."

Bailey jumped to his feet and snapped, "You may not. You may not, and you know it."

When Carter agreed with Bailey, Browning persisted, waving documents in the air.

Carter said the prosecutor had the right to cross-examine "on all areas on which she's opened up in her direct examination."

The judge said, "I don't think the matter is that significant. There are plenty of areas already opened up, Mr. Browning... and if that doesn't give you areas to question her, I don't know what is."

The jury was returned to the courtroom, Bailey quickly ended his direct examination and Browning, his face still red with anger, opened with several routine questions.

At one point in the brief exchange, Miss Hearst said she endorsed social change but did not support any sort of violent change.

At the end of the day, Browning was asked outside of court if there was any chance of ever opening up the year that the defense wants kept out of the trial.

"It doesn't look much like it, she said."

During Wednesday's session, Hearst had sat impassively as a video newscast of the May 17, 1974, trial between the SLA and Los Angeles was played.

Six SLA members, including DeLoach and William Wolfe, whom she identified as her rapists, died in the inferno.

She wept briefly, however, when she defiantly and profanely-strewn tapes of the slain SLA members were played in the courtroom. Miss Hearst had previously denounced the tapes and said the SLA rhetoric was written by the HARRISES.

She described the HARRISES as the guardians of the fallen SLA members, ordered her to remain with them and build their shattered tribe or be killed.

Bigfoot explored

Krantz, felt the stories of large, hair-covered creatures were worth looking into.

Bryant said that in 1969, "I was young, ambitious and trying to make my mark in the world." When he first took a serious interest in Bigfoot and began examining with Krantz, he was skeptical.

"I thought someone was really pulling off a good one," he said. If he could prove the Bigfoot stories false once and for all, he figured he'd be famous. "I thought I'd have my picture in the paper and appear on the Johnny Carson show."

The two anthropologists checked newspaper accounts and traced down those who said they had seen Bigfoot. At first, many alleged Bigfoot encounters were obviously
