Consol scores high on tests

Unlike the national average, Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) scores at A&M Consolidated High School have not declined, Superintendent Fred A. Hopson said last night.

"Scores for our high school have stayed the same, if not actually increased over the last five years," said Hopson, during a meeting of the A&M Consolidated School Board.

He said SAT scores for high school juniors and seniors in the school district are consistently above the national average.

In 1974-75 the national average on the verbal section of the SAT was 368, he said.

The SAT scores for the high school are 35.8 points higher than the national mean on the verbal section of the test, he said.

He said the high school scores were 33.6 points higher than the national mean on the math section. Hopson said because only 50 per cent of the students eligible for the SAT actually signed up for the test the statistics could contain some inconsistencies.

Also at the meeting, the school board filed the official papers calling for a $6.428 million bond election on April 3.

The bond election was approved at the Feb. 23 special meeting of the school board.

The funds called for in the proposed bond issue are not to be for acquisition or sale of any new school sites the board said.

Approval of the bond issue by voters would provide funds for a vocational center at the high school and a new fifth and sixth grade building at the Old Middle School site on Jersey St.

The board also passed a resolution commending the Citizen's Advisory Committee for work done on the proposed bond election.

Signs violate city law

requirement that spectacular signs be at least 50 feet from a thoroughfare to prevent confusion with traffic signals.

Such "massive non-conformities" indicate that the ordinance needs to be changed, said Koehler. "Whenever there is a large number of violations, that law should be strongly questioned," Koehler said.

"Maybe the ordinance is asking far more than it should," Koehler added.

Many of the violating signs were erected prior to the 1972 ordinance, Koehler noted. Because of clerical oversights, several permits have been issued for infracting signs since that time, he said.

In a couple cases a contractor has erected a spectacular sign without specifying such on his permit application. In other instances, Koehler said, bogus permits have been approved because of file mix-ups. Many of these violations are still visible along College Station streets, while other businesses, once notified, soon corrected their violations, Koehler said.

"We should have some reasonably prompt program for enforcement, but we're going to have to wait (for additional inspectors)," Koehler suggested. "The city has grown too rapidly, and there's just not enough time."
