

Mayan art reveals an elitist civilization

by HOLLY HUTCHINSON
The artwork of the Mayas, which survived almost 5,000 years, is the impression of an elite civilization, according to John Lunsford, professor of art history at the Dallas Museum of Fine Arts. Lunsford, who is also curator of the Dallas Museum of Fine Arts, Friday night on "Maya Civilization: Art and Architecture Reveal a Society." His slide presentation and film on the Maya civilization dealt with "Art in Man's Experience," which was the last in the College of Art series, "A World for the Ages."

Concentration was placed on the period of the Mayas which ran from 200-300 A.D. to 900 A.D. Lunsford explained that because the Mayas were always dealing with the "civilization," one often gets a skewed view of the Maya world as shown in their architecture, statues and vases. He chose these kinds of art to reveal the social structure of the Mayas. The Mayas remain technologically advanced in the Stone Age. Lunsford said this is because they used any metal in their stone and jade carvings. He said their simple tool kit probably contained jade axes, flints, tubulars of bone and bamboo, and powder which was used as an abrasive to polish the carved stones. Jade is a very hard stone and was considered by the Mayas to be their most precious material. Most of the vases were painted with mineral pigments, burnished with jade powder, and fired (subjected to heat)," Lunsford said. Although their fires were not enough to produce a glaze, the vases had a slight shine. The ceramic works have been found in quantity, but, Lunsford said, as yet, no evidence of a kiln used for baking or drying) has been found.

Lunsford said the Mayas created hieroglyphics (a picture used to represent a word) and many of these carvings were of aristocrats. Dr. Gove were distinguished by their artificially flattened heads and large noses. The babies' heads were flattened at birth to produce a flattened set. On vases, the aristocrats were depicted a darker color than the lower classes of people. Although the facial features of the aristocratic men and women were similar in the art work, a distinction could be made as the men had clipped hair and the women's was shown over their collars. Many of these carved of painted vases carried fans which were

WASHINGTON (AP) — The news media asked the Supreme Court yesterday to bar lower courts from restricting news coverage of pending criminal trials. A Nebraska prosecutor argued that the orders are needed to protect the rights of defendants. E. Barrett Prettyman of Washington, representing news media organizations, said these orders were becoming more frequent and the number of 11 of them in the last six months.

Society souring

May wants new values

By C. E. COWART
Our society has lost its sense of freedom and values Dr. Rollo May said in a Great Issues speech last night.

May is a New York psychoanalyst and author who talked about the present nature of man. May noted that our freedom and values interlocked and that freedom was necessary for having values. He defined freedom as the human capacity to be aware of the stimuli around us and to throw our weight into a response to a certain stimulus. May said if one wanted to be free he must accept the possibility of a life of loneliness and misunderstanding. "People don't want the burden of freedom; it takes courage to accept the fact that you are free," Dr. May said. "Freedom is also anxiety; it's what makes you try to do, and sometimes unknowingly do, better," he added.

Witnesses taped in Marine's death
OCEANSIDE, Calif. (AP) — The lawyer for the family of Lynn McClure said Monday he has interviewed two ex-Marines who helped beat McClure to death in a close-combat drill in San Diego.

Dr. May characterized this flaw in America by pointing out losses of individualism, privacy and rationalism. Individualism has been overtaken by conformity May said. May said privacy has been replaced by gossip, slander and libel, and rationalism is dying or already dead.

May said values are radically changing. "Our society does not have the stable values we need and we can't absorb outside values. The old values are going out and the new values have not fully formed yet. But with our new set of values we must develop a new freedom.

"We are now living in a time of hopelessness with a lack of goals and direction. People have to practice being human by exercising their freedom and learning right from wrong," May said.

May cited present-day notables who had failed to accomplish their freedom. He said the Watergate criminals were well-adjusted crooks who were victims of obedience. He said it was destructive that Ford had pardoned Nixon, because Nixon hadn't become aware of his crimes and was worse for it. May also said

Patricia Hearst was better for having been found guilty because she would now have a chance to solve her problems.

May emphasized the importance of using one's freedom to select individual values. He says many of today's society think of themselves as well adjusted, but they are fat, comfortable and negligent of responsibilities to themselves.

Winning is not part of freedom, May said. A sense of job, creativity and productiveness can be gained in our complex world without worrying about time, May said.

"The evidence for freedom cannot be found outside yourself," said May.

College Station fines give city $78,400 after deductions in '76

College Station court fines are expected to reap $78,400 for the city this year after state deductions.

The state levies $2.50 from each court fine. In 1975, $522.24 collected from these fines was sent to the Criminal Justice Planning Fund via the governor's office.

The Criminal Justice Planning Fund uses the money to update law enforcement agencies and support the criminal justice system.

The $2.50 state deduction is raised to $7.50 for misdemeanor convictions or fines. A $12.50 deduction is assessed on each felony charge.

Provided College Station meets the tax deadline, the city retains five per cent of the state's funds as service fees.

Warm spring saps sap

Associated Press
MAPLE CORNERS, Vt. — For the maple sugar makers of the Northeast, an unseasonably warm spring boils down to one thing: a bitter financial year ahead. "We've only produced about half as much as last year and the season's just about over," said Floyd Fitch, whose son, Sedric, tapped 600 maple trees here. "It's downright discouraging."
