Dolphin communication veteran speaks at A&M

Dr. John C. Lilly, veteran researcher in dolphin communication and dolphin-human relations, will speak Thursday at Texas A&M University. Dr. Lilly appears through the Great Issues committee of the Memorial Student Center. "Interspecies Communication" is the title of his presentation, announced Great Issues chairman Nancy O'Shay. Admission is free for A&M students with activity cards, $1 for non-students.

William Colby, Carl Sagan, planetary astronomer and exobiologist, and Jane Goodall, anthropologist. Planned for 8 p.m. in the Rudder Theater, the presentation by Dr. Lilly is expected to deal mostly with his more recent studies of human activities as products of environment and the past. Dr. Lilly is a medical doctor with degrees from Cal Tech and the University of Pennsylvania. His background includes work in biophysics, neurophysiology, electronics and neuroanatomy. The qualified psychoanalyst has done extensive study and research in solitude, isolation and confinement. This was followed by work with dolphins, providing evidence, he says, of life styles in other species which exceed the highest ethical and moral values of humans. They include, he indicates, compassion, cooperation, interdependence, non-violence and self-sacrifice.

HUD visits A&M Urban studies aid Garland

Observers from Washington visited Texas A&M University last Wednesday to gauge the progress of studies in the Garland Urban Observatory project. This Program, administered through the Center for Urban Programs at A&M, involves cooperation between the City of Garland and A&M to solve problems facing the city. Dr. Earl Lindveit of the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) and Larry Williams of the National League of Cities went to Garland Thursday after consulting with A&M personnel involved in the program. The second on-site visit included a meeting of the project's policy board. Members of the A&M board are Dr. Richard E. Thomas, associate dean, College of Engineering, and director, Center for Urban Programs; W. David Maxwell, dean, College of Liberal Arts; Raymond D. Reed, dean, College of Architecture and Environmental Design; and Ralph Hambrick, assistant professor, Political Science. Also present at the meeting were Program Director Dale R. Burton from Garland; Dr. Roger Elliott, Industrial Engineering; and Dr. Charles Lamb, Marketing, who is University coordinator for the project. Several faculty members involved in research for the program also attended.

Thomas. "It is based on the idea that the cities can benefit from the universities' expertise in many areas and the universities can gain insight into city issues from such a relationship." Nine other projects of this sort were funded by HUD through the National League of Cities. It is a three-year program and is beginning its third year. "The Garland Observatory is a particularly interesting one because it is the only project where the participating university is not located within the city receiving the assistance," Lamb said.

"The Garland Urban Observatory project is part of a program designed to encourage cooperation between cities and universities," said

Classic movies added to English film library

Film director D. W. Griffith's classic "Birth of a Nation" (1915) has been purchased by the Texas A&M University English department for use in its cinema course and other classes. Dr. Harriette Andreadis, assistant professor, received a migrant to purchase the film and one of Griffith's shorter features, "Musketeers of Pig Alley," made in 1912. The two films are the first in the new departmental film library. Dr. Andreadis teaches the first cinema course at A&M to study the development of both popular films and documentaries. Study is augmented by once-a-week viewings of such films as "The Great Train Robbery," "Citizen Kane," "Wild Strawberries," "The Bicycle Thief" and "Brewster McCloud." In the past, each of the films has been rented for use in the class. "Birth of a Nation" depicts the South before and after the Civil War with emphasis on the rise of the Ku Klux Klan. "Musketeers of Pig Alley" is described as one of the earliest gangster films and was partially shot in New York City's Lower East Side. Keeping the films in the department will help in tracing Griffith's influences such as close-ups, iris effects and sophisticated interests in later American and foreign films. Other English classes will use the films to complement instruction.
