Emotion, variety shown

Symphony, violinist, harmonize well

By JEANNINE ATZENHOFFER

Chaotic musical sounds filled Rudder Auditorium last night with an indication of the enchantment that was to come. The musicians on stage tuned their instruments to the sound of an oboe, the lights dimmed and the presentation of the San Antonio Symphony began.

Roger Melone was the conductor of the OPAS attraction. He opened the concert with Overture to "Rosamunde" by Schubert. The overture's beginning was intense, but eventually it softened and flowed rhythmically. There were interjections of bursts of music that enhanced the variety Melone produced with his conducting. Melone noticeably rocked and swayed with each musical composition.

With the beginning of the second musical piece came the appearance of the internationally famed violinist, Eugene Fodor. The 25-year-old stood rather nonchalantly before the audience while the orchestra began Concerto No. 1 for Violin in D Major by Paganini. One could sense the respect the musicians had for Fodor as they were quick to congratulate and applaud him.

At first glance, Fodor appeared to be a care-free youth dressed up in tie and tails. But his music was far from ordinary. With his violin he produced a variety of tones that were captivating.

The audience seemed to enjoy the performance as much as Fodor enjoyed giving it. Twice he evoked smiles, and even some laughter, from his audience when he jokingly raised his eyebrows at the conductor after successfully completing a particularly difficult part of the concerto.

It was a distinctive harmony created by the violinist and the symphony. Fodor's facial expressions mimicked the moods of the music he created. Fodor responded to the standing ovation he received with a solo from Paganini.

The symphony resumed after intermission with Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy. It was a soft piece that began with a flute solo and the flutter of a harp. The cupid-like quality of the music, created by the chiming of tiny bells, reminded one of the movie, "Fantasia." It built to a rousing crescendo that brought a burst of applause from the audience.

The last work was Symphony No. 6, Opus 53 by Shostakovich. The first movement of the symphony was very stirring with its somber intensity.

The second movement was dance-like with shattering climaxes incorporating special percussion and xylophone effects.

A saucy third movement ended the performance with a whirl of rhythms.

After the show, Fodor said he enjoyed working with Melone. Though this is only their third concert together, Fodor said, "There is a personal relationship in our music."

Fodor became interested in violin at an early age. "I fell in love with the violin and convinced my parents to let me begin lessons," he said. He was seven at that time. At 11, he was a soloist with the Denver Symphony. He received several scholarships to study under famous violin instructors. He has since toured with symphonies throughout the U.S. and abroad. He has won numerous international awards. In Moscow, he is known as the best young American musician since Van Cliburn.

Fodor raises horses in his spare time and is particularly proud of his Arabian. He enjoys spending time at his house in Bermuda where he plays racquetball and scuba dives.

For a one year period, Fodor is artist-in-residence at the University of Wisconsin. He spends a few weeks out of the year giving lectures and violin lessons.
