Richards does not pass test

United Press International
PORT WASHINGTON, N.Y. — U.S. Open tennis officials have decided not to recognize the sex-chromosome test that transsexual Dr. Renee Richards said she passed last week in Little Rock, Ark. — and as a result, she has threatened to sue the U.S. Tennis Association for "personal discrimination" damages.

The officials said only tests administered to women players by the Institute of Sports Medicine at New York's Lenox Hill Hospital would be used for admission to the U.S. Open.

Dr. Richards said she learned of the test, known as the Barr test, just two weeks ago in Little Rock, Ark., she forwarded the results to the U.S. Open Tennis Association and the U.S. Tennis Association.

She is angry because after this test, known as the Barr test, just two weeks ago in Little Rock, Ark., she forwarded the results to the U.S. Open Tennis Association and the U.S. Tennis Association. "There's no distrust of our tests, it's just a matter of standing up for our sport," said USTA President "Slew" Hester, Jr.
