Pure Prairie League good, not great

Band plays without enthusiasm

By JOHN W. TYNES
Battalion Staff

The Pure Prairie League concert at Texas A&M Saturday night was pretty good. If the members of the band had shown a little more interest in their performance, the show might have been great.

There is some obvious musical talent in the group as demonstrated by some excellent guitar (both electric and steel), an assortment of tight, snappy rhythms and some good vocals by several of the players.

All this talent could be the making of a terrific band, one that could easily wrap a crowd around its finger and keep it there even for a long concert like Saturday's. But there are a few problems that will have to be solved first.

Even at the end of their concert, when the remaining crowd had gathered at the base of the stage, dancing and clapping enthusiastically, the musicians never seemed to get very excited about the whole thing.

Granted, the band did show a bit of interest toward the very end when they finally responded to the crowd's enthusiasm. They did a little of the usual concert stuff: swinging the guitars around on fast bends, bending low at the knees to play out a rock rhythm and even a few dancing-as-he-played keyboard-players.

Overall, however, they danced around the stage very little between-songs conversation was sparse and uninteresting. Indeed, was often left out completely as the band jumped from one song into the next.

Another problem was the overwhelming variety of instruments used in each song. The group large (six, seven or eight persons) a time; it fluctuated) and each musician seemed to think his part the cornerstone of the number. Occasionally, the band became difficult to hear because of the loudness and complexity of instrumentals. Much of the excellence of the individual musicians was lost also.

In general, the concert was those shows that you hate to see because there's a possibility that the band might start kicking at a minute. On the other hand, the hate to stay because the performance is bordering on boredom.

Most of the audience stayed the entire concert Saturday night but they might not even go to a time Pure Prairie League comes town.
