Veterinarian sets up farm 'hot line' for customers

United Press International
NEW YORK — It's too bad James Herriot didn't have someone like Dr. Don Awe to fall back on in the 1930s.
The doctor could have been a great help to the youthful veterinarian in rural Yorkshire. But in that case Herriot would not have had to solve all those problems with animals by himself and he might never have felt like writing his wonderful books "All Creatures Great and Small" and "All Things Bright and Beautiful."

Awe works for Cargill, Minneapolis commodity and marketing firm, and health products manager for Nutrena Feeds division. He set up an unusual "hot line" for veterinarians and their customers to give quick advice about what to do with horses, sheep, poultry and other animals.
