Shipment of oil to be stored in Netherland

United Press International NEDERLAND, Tex. — The first shipment of more than one billion barrels of crude oil on its way to be stored in Louisiana's salt domes arrived in this small southeast Texas port yesterday.

The Federal Energy Administration plans to store the government-owned oil in the domes as a safeguard against a future Arab oil embargo, a spokesman for Sun Oil Co., which is handling the transfer.

The first shipment of 412,000 barrels of light Arabian crude oil was unloaded from a tanker yesterday and will be transferred by barge through the Intercoastal Canal to salt domes near Hackberry, La.

A spokesman said the oil will be pumped into the domes starting Friday.

Analyst says oil spill not harmful to wildlife

United Press International PORT ARANSAS — A Coast Guard analyst said yesterday a gooey substance dotting an eight-mile stretch of one of Texas' favorite beaches definitely was not high-sulphur crude oil from a supertanker which unloaded in the Texas Gulf last week.

"It's still under investigation," Lt. Cmdr. Jerry Victor said. "The substance is a heavy unrefined product and it has very little sulphur content. That eliminates most of your Middle East Crude Oil. Most of your Midwestern oil has high sulphur content.

However, Victor said he had eliminated the possibility the sticky petroleum substance might be a low-sulphur crude which spilled from a ship offshore and floated onto the sandy resort area on Monday's high tide.

That narrows it down to two possible sources: that is, possibly from a ship that is carrying crude oil from South America or Indonesia — sources where they have low sulphur content — or it could be a natural crude from a seepage, possibly off Mexico."

Victor said the oil, which amounted to about 50 barrels, did not spill from the Stavros G.L., the largest supertanker ever to unload off Texas.
