NEW YORK—Pee Wee Reese should be in Baseball's Hall of Fame, but isn't.

That's simply an oversight. He isn't fretting about it, and shouldn't, because although the baseball writers haven't seen fit yet to install him into the Hall at Cooperstown, his peers voted him into a much bigger and more meaningful Hall a long time ago, the Hall of Extraordinary Human Beings.

Beyond the shadow of any question, Harold "Pee Wee" Reese belongs in such a special place and never was that more apparent than it was a week ago in the Grand Ballroom of the New York Sheraton where some of the most celebrated names in baseball were on hand to pay homage to the late Jackie Robinson upon the 30th anniversary of his entrance into major league baseball.

Bowie Kuhn, the baseball commissioner, made the introductions. Robinson's widow, Rachel, was there with members of her family and she spoke about the Jackie Robinson Foundation, which has been established to perpetuate his name and his goals. Joe DiMaggio and Willie Mays, the honorary captains for the All-Star Game, also were present. So were Roy Campanella, Don Newcombe and Joe Black, all teammates of Robinson at one time.

Campanella, especially, caught the emotions of all the people in the room with what he had to say, after having recently finished a hospital confinement of one year and two weeks, during most of which time he was forced to lie on his stomach.

But nobody moved those in the huge room more than Reese, the former captain and shortstop for the Brooklyn Dodgers, the Southern boy from Louisville, who made everything so much easier for Jackie Robinson.

"Rachel, thank you for getting me into this," Pee Wee laughed, looking at her sitting up on the sals along with all the others.

"People are always asking me 'What was it like playing with Jackie Robinson?'" Reese went on. "To tell you the truth, it was a little strange."

Pushing 59, Pee Wee Reese remains the All-American Boy.

His hair is still blond enough and smile still boyish enough to evoke memories of the kid who once won the marble shooting championship of Louisville, and it was easy to picture him in the time frame he now began talking about when he was a chief petty officer in the Navy during the fall of 1945—two years before Robinson was to play his first game for the Dodgers.

"I was coming from Guam and one of the fellows on the ship came running up to me and said, 'Pee Wee, they've just signed a black player, the Dodgers did.' A half hour later, he came back and said, 'Not only is he black, he's a shortstop.'"

"Well, you can imagine how I felt. The only thing I know Jackie Robinson was that he was a great football player at UC. Jackie was good in everything he did. We found out he was a card player... he took over the tennis player, too. There was anything he wasn't good at."

"Jackie, God bless him, was a lot of credit for helping him. It's nice to be remembered by him better than not to be remembered for not helping him out. But I think I did that much. If I remember called him a 'nigger' or a 'melon eater,' I didn't run around stands, point my finger at him. You're not supposed to do that. Jackie could take care of himself."

Reese paused a moment. "I just put myself in his shoes," he said. "Pee Wee Reese was the only white player in a black team. No way I could've done it at all. Jackie was a super player. He helped me a helluva lot more than I helped him."

Tagged fish mean $

Some alert coastal fishermen may find that along with landing a good catch they've hooked themselves an extra bonus. There are fish out there in the bays that carry tags worth up to $25.

In order to study migration patterns, biologists of the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department are tagging five game species: red drum, black drum, speckled trout, sheepshead and flounder. Important information can be gained as to growth and movement of the fish, if the tags are returned.

As an incentive to fishermen to send in the tags, there's a monetary reward. This could be $1, $5, $10, $25, the amount being allocated according to computer code. A sportsman does not know how much of a jackpot he has hit until he is notified, but certainly the value, both to him and biologists.

The program is a cooperative effort between the P&W department and the National Marine Fisheries Service. The NMFS is the agency that provides the funds for the program. Their biologists also do some tagging of Port Aransas commercial Gulf fish, mainly red snapper, mackerel and kingfish.

There are two kinds of tags. One, which is simpler and more likely to be lost, is pushed through the gills and has a hanging red tag. The method used most often is an internal anchor. A small hole is inserted through a slight indentation in the center part of the abdomen. There is a visible yellow stain.

There has been a problem with some fishermen who have discarded tagged fish thinking they had caught a disease, especially when the fish has become overgrown and inedible. That the streamer can be seen readily on close examination.

Anyone catching a tagged fish should report it to the P&W office. As closely as possible, pinpoint the location where caught. Other information should be furnished should particularly the length of the fish, weight, if possible, date caught, the name and address of the fisherman.

In return, as well as the money, information will be sent to where the fish was tagged. Other tagging programs have been conducted in the past but not been continued for a number of years until the present one started in October 1975. The program has ranged between 10 percent, depending on the bay.

The more cooperation biologists, the more the able to learn in order to ease growing pressures on the resource and provide for management.
