NASA-made space suit lets boy explore world

HOUSTON — Doctors unveiled a "space suit" Thursday that has enabled David, an immunity deficient child, to hug his mother and walk outside. The child, whose last name has been withheld since his birth in a sterile environment, lacks the natural organisms which protect most people from minor infections and has never touched skin other than his own.

Until NASA and Texas Children's Hospital developed the $20,000 rubber, plastic and nylon suit with a bubble helmet, he had never left the protective cells constructed at his home, in a van used to transport him and at the hospital.

"His eyes were huge" the first time he tried the suit last July, said nurse Brynn Holcombe. "He didn't say anything. It was his expression. He kept looking at the gloves."

"He was looking around, hugging his family, because he had never really gotten to do that, and he said, 'Let's go take a walk.'"

NASA's Dr. Lon Bergman said the suit, paid for by taxpayers under the agency's "spinoff" development program, is more like quarantine clothes worn by astronauts after return from space rather than like actual space suits.

He said the suit, which is attached to powered ventilating equipment on a seat-equipped David can ride, has multiple layers to protect against puncture.

David's physician, Dr. B. Nichols, said the suit was designed in order to facilitate David's continued development despite his handicap. He said it is not clear whether the boy will ever escape protected environment.

"He's an intelligent child, he doesn't have the cultural experience that we like him to have," Nichols said. "We can allow him to do physical skills he can't do in the present isolator. You see, he's clumsy he was."

Nichols showed a film of him climbing into and trying the hospital. He has to go through a tube leading from the bubble. He smiled, shouted "it," played with toys and ran out for his family and associates.

David has had interaction with others through gloves extending into his bubble, but has been limited as to movement and exploration of the outside world. There is a taking him to the zoo, for instance.

Officials said logistics and the requirement of support personnel make it unlikely the suit will be used more than once a week near future.

They said the suit, which was tested at Los Angeles Children's Hospital soon, or suits like it, have other uses for persons with temporary immunity problems such as in cases of leukemia and other diseases.
