A&M women 'legal' in 1963

of separation. While the first college catalog stated that only males would be admitted, the question of coeducation never arose for twenty years, because no woman ever applied. But somehow women appeared and have become an important part of the A&M tradition.

Today, there are women here at A&M who remember those "old days." One woman, currently attending A&M, Madam M., was first enrolled here in 1949, fifteen years before women were officially admitted. She even has a '49 Aggie ring.

Madam M. appears to have mixed memories of A&M. She recalls sleepless nights and dance cards with fondness. Her favorite story tells how on her honeymoon, "we had just been married that afternoon. That evening, another cadet called and asked if I would go to a Saturday night dance with him."

Yet other memories seem to point to that feeling of segregation many A&M women have experienced. "One professor refused to give any of the women in our class an 'A,'" Madam M. said. And even today, she requested that her name be withheld to spare any "hassles."

This December 454 women have applied for graduation, and all of them are official.

Although women weren't recognized as official students at Texas A&M until June 1, 1963, Sophie and Mary Hutson completed the civil engineering program at Texas A&M in 1903. They are dressed cadet uniforms that were gifts from 1901 graduates of A&M.
