Doctor disputes theory of baby's deprivation

United Press International
NEW YORK — What's ahead for a baby whose mother hits the bottle pretty hard now and then and whose dad sometimes loses the food money at the racetrack?

The baby may sometimes go hungry.
The baby may suffer other kinds of neglect when mom's in an alcoholic haze. In toddler years, the baby born into such circumstances may be cold, unloved, often ignored.

But, according to Dr. Jerome Kagan, Harvard University professor of human development, this baby born into deprived circumstances and/or neglect will not necessarily be a bum adult.

He said contrary to precepts from child development experts for generations, there often is little connection between a baby's early experiences and the kind of adult it becomes.

Kagan has put together evidence showing the first few years of life are not so important as previously thought. He has found that the immature mind seems to be elastic, springing back to its original shape once the child is removed from potentially harmful or negative surroundings.

Kagan's research will be published by Harvard University Press in the spring. It is called "The Place of Infancy in Development."

He gives a sneak preview of his book in a report in the first issue of Human Nature, a magazine that covers the human sciences in depth.

"Both life and laboratory research could undermine the Western belief that a baby's experiences determine the course of its adult life," Kagan says.

To support that conclusion, Kagan cites eight separate studies of children in a wide range of circumstances — war orphans, middle-class children, and children in other cultures and cases of unprecedented early childhood deprivation.

"We could find little relationship between psychological qualities in the first three years of life and aspect of behavior in adulthood," Kagan reports. He adds:

"Not until a child was 6 years old was there any evidence that his or her behavior foretold the kind of adult he would become."

The child development expert tells about a study of children who grew up in isolated Guatemalan villages.

Kagan said in an interview these and other discoveries of the infant "imply that his experiences may be permanent."

"The fears and joys of the year seem to be part of a child's future's script for development. Harbingers of adolescent and prophetic signs of childhood stress," he said.
