Cooling trend baffling

Although two-tenths and four-tenths of a degree Fahrenheit per decade may not seem like much, meteorologists point out that if the average temperature of large parts of Earth fell by two or three degrees, it probably would be enough to build up ice sheets — the way the last ice age began.

Why the cooling occurred, and whether it will continue, are questions that cannot be answered on basis of today's knowledge.

"It's all very peculiar because the carbon dioxide effect should be working the other way," said Dr. James Angell, a climate specialist at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's Air Resources laboratories at Silver Spring, Md.

Angell is one of nine scientists from the United States, West Germany and Japan who discussed the climatic trend information in a report in the British scientific journal, Nature.

He said the data show that there apparently has been more cooling at higher elevations in the atmosphere than at the surface, and that there has been an increasing difference in the rates of cooling in the tropics of the Northern Hemisphere.

"You're getting an increase both in the change of temperature horizontally and a change in temperature vertically," he said.

"This would lead to greater variability in the weather which I think we're seeing," Angell said. "The difference that drives weather systems. The greater the difference is, the more intense low pressure is."

He cited a rain, snow and storm that moved up the East two weeks ago as an example.

"It was a very intense storm. Many areas had record low temperatures. Things are getting more than they were previous years. Angell said the only way we are going to get a better understanding of climatic changes and causes them is to continue collecting and improve weather data around the world.
